H. FOULKS LYNCH & CO LTD

The following statistics testify to the lead still held by Foulks Lynch in the field of correspondence tuition for the examinations of the Institute of Chartered Accountants:

In the two years ending with the September 1968 Intermediate examination, candidates presented by H. Foulks Lynch & Co Ltd obtained:

In the Intermediate Examinations

Thirty-three out of thirty-four honours, including all the first three places, and thirty-two out of thirty-four prizes;

and

In the Final Examinations

Eighty-three out of eighty-seven honours, including all the first two places, and one hundred and one out of one hundred and two prizes.

However, the practice of augmenting home study with Oral courses has grown, and Foulks Lynch (Classes) Ltd, an associate company, have extended and refurnished their classrooms to meet this growing demand. The latest addition to this service of oral tuition consists of study courses for Intermediate and Final students, of one week duration, to be taken about half-way through each stage of their examination preparation. These provide an invaluable opportunity to consolidate the subject-matter studied thus far. Full details of these and other Introductory and Revision Courses may be obtained from:

Inside the Revenue

HOW is it that excess profits tax is still being collected 23 years after it ceased? How often does the Board of Inland Revenue meet? What is the Head Office attitude towards either 'vindictive' or 'generous' Inspectors of Taxes? These are the sort of questions which have recently been put to senior officials of the Inland Revenue during the hearing of evidence by Subcommittee C of the Parliamentary Estimates Committee.

The function of the committee is broadly to see whether Government departments are operating as economically as possible – that value is being obtained for the money laid out on the machinery of Government. Subcommittees have been appointed to deal with the various departments and it is Subcommittee C which is looking into the Inland Revenue. Minutes of evidence of three meetings which are being held at weekly intervals have so far been published[1].

At the first meeting, on January 30th, there were three members of the subcommittee present: Sir Eric Errington, the chairman, Rear-Admiral Morgan Giles and Mr George Wallace. Before them was a memorandum prepared by the Inland Revenue, somewhat on the lines of the first part of the annual report of the Revenue, but rather more detailed. Accompanying the memorandum was a chart showing the separate functions of the different branches. The memorandum, though not the chart, is included in the published minutes. The division which carries out the administration and management of the Inland Revenue duties (and other tasks entrusted to the Board), still bears the rather odd name of 'Stamps and Taxes Division'.

The memorandum refers to the major reorganization scheme for the automation of the work of the department. Over the next ten years, PAYE work will be centralized in nine large regional computer centres. The first, East Kilbride, came into operation last year, and with an eventual staff of 1,350 it will deal with all PAYE taxpayers in Scotland.

The routine work of assessing taxes under other schedules, as well as corporation tax and surtax, is to be brought into the computers and collection may also eventually be brought in. Of the remaining eight centres, the locations of seven have already been determined: Bootle for the north-west region; Cardiff for Wales and public departments; Shipley for the north-east of England; Manchester for inner London and Edinburgh for outer London; Tyneside for eastern England; and Southampton/Portsmouth for the southern counties. There is also to be a midland centre, but how Northern Ireland is to be included in the computer scheme has not yet been decided.

At the first day's hearing the Inland Revenue fielded a team of three witnesses: Sir Arnold France, K.C.B., Chairman of the Board, Mr N. C. Price, Deputy Chairman, and Mr W. H. B. Johnson, Director of Establishments. They were closely questioned on the fact that excess profits tax, which terminated some 23 years ago, was still being collected. Mr Price replied that the great majority of cases were inquiry cases and Sir Arnold said that some were held up pending decision about foreign taxes, while others were with the Board's solicitor.

Sir Arnold revealed that formal meetings of the Board of Inland Revenue do not take place more than once or twice a year, although there were many informal meetings. Matters requiring a meeting of two commissioners (which constituted a meeting of the Board) were arranged as necessary for such matters as deciding whether or not to bring criminal proceedings in a particular case.

More than half of the Stamps and Taxes Division, although administrative in rank, consists of Civil Servants from the specialist branches. Mr Price himself was an Inspector of Taxes. He sketched the procedure inside the division when the Chancellor consults the Board on a possible new tax. He also explained what happens when a Member of Parliament writes to the Financial Secretary about some complaint against the Revenue. The Revenue calls for a report from its local officer and then drafts a reply for the Financial Secretary to sign.

At the second hearing on February 6th, the subcommittee chairman wanted to know whether there were regular routine meetings at the top. The answer was that ad hoc meetings were held as necessary, with close liaison by word of mouth. Sir Leonard Barford, the Chief Inspector of Taxes, who was present on this occasion, said he met his two deputies every day, and all problems which might have to be brought to the Board's attention were automatically referred to him. Sir Leonard had direct access to every member of the Board. It did not seem, however, that the subcommittee was entirely satisfied about absence of routine meetings, and Sir Arnold said he was still considering this possibility.

The chairman then went on to question the Chief Inspector about the staffing position in his branch. Sir Leonard said that a few years ago they had adequate numbers of trained inspectors but since the Finance Act 1965 there had been a flood of changes. Changes like the introduction of the capital gains tax, or corporation tax, involved the branch in large-scale redesigning of all procedures and instructions, and on many policy issues. As the staff could not be expanded, something had to go.

Moreover, the new tax structure was accompanied by transitional provisions which involved a considerable additional burden. At the same time, over the last eight years the net increase in trained inspectors had been only 40. This meant that inspectors had to be more selective in the cases they were able to pursue and fight. There were adequate numbers of inspectors who were not fully trained.

As to the recruitment of higher grade inspectors, Sir Arnold said the Civil Service in general, and the tax inspecting branch in particular, did not have sufficient appeal to the graduate population. A big disadvantage was the commitment to mobility, with transfer from town to town at fairly short intervals. A good many recruits left during their five years training, mostly because it came home to them that they were not going to make the grade. Besides this, once an inspector was fully trained he was a valuable asset to the outside commercial world, which was prepared to bid for him on money terms with which the Civil Service could not compete. In this way the branch lost a steady stream, usually of its best men. Sir Arnold promised to produce statistics of the fall-out.

There was a long discussion on the changes brought about by the use of computers, particularly in relation to the possibility of taxpayers being able to discuss their affairs at local tax offices. The day is obviously passing when a PAYE taxpayer can call at the district office to discuss his affairs with an official who has his file. In future the file will have to be obtained from the computer centre. The official wish is, of course, that taxpayers should write in with their inquries, but the committee pointed out that many people are not able to express themselves very well on paper.

Another matter which worried Members of Parliament, according to a member of the committee, was the question of security. When intimate details of a taxpayer's affairs are put into a computer, what steps were taken to see that they remained confidential? The official witness replied he was aware that schemes had been devised but he could not say off-hand what they were.

Liaison between the Chief Inspector and the seven hundred-odd tax districts was also the subject of discussion. The Chief Inspector said he circulated about 140 memoranda a year to district offices relating to recent decisions and changes in procedure. District inspectors could always consult head office but in practice did so very little. They were supervised by 63 inspecting officers.

A committee member wanted to know whether head office ever made an assessment as to whether an individual district inspector was being hard or soft towards the taxpayers in his area. The Chief Inspector replied that if an inspector erred on the side of the vindictive, or was too generous, that was very quickly picked up. Here it seems pertinent to observe that it is nevertheless the case that some inspectors are known for their over-zealousness and others for their leniency.

Asked what was done where vindictiveness was 'picked up', Sir Leonard said:

> 'He is advised through the inspection channels of the official view we would wish him to take. In the individual case, of course, the individual taxpayer has the remedy of going before the independent General Commissioners and if he has been too hard in their view they will, of course, correct it'.

But they will not order the Inland Revenue to pay the successful taxpayer's costs because they have no power to do so.

Yet those costs may well exceed the tax in dispute, which is perhaps one very cogent reason, to use the Chief Inspector's phrase for the 'amazingly small' number of appeals.

Sir Arnold France added words to the effect that inspecting officers had a duty to see whether inspectors had been too lenient or too severe, and would tell them that they were expected to conform to normal standards. But we must say that we have yet to hear of a case where a strict inspector has subsequently written to say that his inspecting officer had 'picked up' the case and told him to change his mind. That would certainly be a pleasant surprise if it ever happened. On the other hand, there have quite often been instances where a new inspector has challenged his predecessor's handling of a case and raised additional assessments. Thus, the taxpayer can have the worst of both worlds.

U S Investment in Britain

WITHIN the last month two important and authoritative pronouncements have been made regarding the extent and value of American investment in Britain. Mr H. F. R. Catherwood, M.A., F.C.A., Director-General of the National Economic Development Office presented a paper at a three-day Anglo-American conference in which he whole-heartedly welcomed the present high rate of US investment in Britain. A week later a PEP pamphlet written mainly by Professor J. H. Dunning entitled The Role of American Investment in the British Economy gave a great deal of statistical information on the extent of this financial penetration, and analysed the views of various sectors of the British public towards it.

Professor Dunning shows that in the ten years up to 1967, the American stake in British industry grew from $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and is now considerably more than £2,000 million. The rate of growth in total US investment has averaged 10 per cent a year and if this were to continue until 1980, the American share of British industry would rise to more than one-fifth. This latter figure is much less than current US investment in Canada or foreign investment in Australia. But American penetration into British industry is significantly greater than the US stake in either France or Germany.

Its influence in manufacturing industry in Britain is, however, greater than its share in her capital resources would suggest. The 1,600 American subsidiaries and Anglo-American financed firms are largely to be found in the fast growing sectors of the economy or in the more technically advanced industries. The top-ten American investors in Britain as revealed by The Times survey of the 500 largest firms in Britain are – Esso Petroleum, Ford Motor Company, F. W. Woolworth, Vauxhall Motors, Gallaher, Standard Telephones & Cables, Rootes Motors, IBM, Mobil Oil and H. J. Heinz. Although only $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of total investment in Britain is American-owned, more than 10 per cent of total profits accrue to these firms. Employment in US controlled manufacturing firms represents only 6 per cent of total manufacturing employment but 10 per cent of manufacturing output is produced by them. One-fifth of new manufacturing investment and over one-sixth of exports is derived from them.

In general, US penetration is in the high output-per-man industries, this is one reason why 6 per cent of total manufacturing employment produces 10 per cent of total manufacturing output. Shipbuilding and textiles do not appear at all in the products which have interested American capital. But Professor Dunning's analysis points strongly to the conclusion that the higher profitability of American companies is due mainly to their greater access to and better use of technical and managerial skills. American-owned car companies for example, average 20 per cent more output per unit of labour than do their British counterparts.

In his paper presented to the Anglo-American conference, Mr Catherwood distinguishes five good reasons why Britain should continue to welcome US investment. In the first place an influx of American capital is of immediate benefit to Britain's balance of payments. The case for new investment is, of course, stronger than the case for an inflow of capital to buy existing companies. Although the press release of Mr Catherwood's paper did not make the point, it has to be remembered that some portion of the profits made by American companies are transmitted to the US, to the detriment of UK balance of payments. The second beneficial effect of US investment is managerial and technological. American firms in Britain can call upon the vast research and technological resources of the parent company and the generally superior managerial skills possessed by US companies. These companies often operate in a continental market and have thereby a range of experience from which British management can benefit.

The third benefit, according to Mr Catherwood, is that regional development in Britain has been enormously helped forward by US investment. But there is some doubt about this, Professor Dunning shows that over half the American firms established in Britain since 1950 have been in London and the south-east. From other sources, it is known that American firms employ over 30 per cent of the work people in the London ring of new towns. In at least one, the proportion is over 50.

A fourth benefit, and one which is overwhelmingly important at the moment, is the high export record of US companies. This arises because American firms are generally more efficient and competitive than British firms in the same industry. And as a fifth benefit, the Director-General of NEDO distinguishes an unquantifiable one: an improvement in Anglo-American relations which is brought about by US investment. Again, this may be doubted. Many British trade unions and their members are suspicious of American penetration. And indeed it is Government policy to ensure that US companies do not control the whole or major part of a key industry. Any further US penetration into the computer industry in Britain, for example, would be resisted.

In the light of these two reports what should we conclude about US investment? Surely, that its advantages greatly exceed its dangers.

Expiring Time Limits

THE practical convenience of an annual date at which to review expiring time limits was recognized by the Finance Act 1968. In relation to capital gains tax an election for valuation on April 6th, 1965, of an asset then held, as provided for by paragraph 25 (1) of Schedule 6 to the Finance Act 1965, may be made up to April 5th, 1969, as regards disposals taking place in the twelve months after April 5th, 1966. As regards the chargeable gains of companies, however, the time limit expires with the second anniversary of the end of the accounting period in which the disposal occurs.

The use of company accounting periods for time-limit purposes restricts the general significance of the April 5th dateline. This remains significant, however, in the context of the utilization of franked investment income so that in relation to accounting periods ending within the fiscal year to April 5th, 1967, for trading losses identified under section 58 (2) of the Finance Act 1965 and capital allowances identified under section 74 (3) of the Capital Allowances Act 1968 (formerly section 56 (6) of the 1965 Act), a claim must be made in accordance with section 9 of the Income Tax Management Act 1964 not later than April 5th, 1969.

This, 1968–69, is the last of the three years in which the distributions made by companies are significant for the purpose of the transitional 'three-year' surplus under section 85 of the Finance Act 1965. The tapering-off relief for cessation of a source granted by section 87 is reduced by a further one-quarter if that event occurs after April 5th, 1969.

A significant saving may be available to individuals who are able to arrange an election for short-term gains purposes (Case VII of Schedule D) as permitted by paragraph 19 of Schedule 9 to the Finance Act 1962. For gifts where a joint election is appropriate this must be effected by April 5th, 1969, for gifts (or bargains not at arm's length) in 1967–68 but in the event of a unilateral election by the donor the time of first disposal of the property comprised in the gift initiates this relevant period. Similar remarks apply to the election for 'roll-over' relief where an asset is appropriated to a trade by an individual.

Restraint Order on Former Certified Accountant

ON Wednesday of last week Mr Leslie Ronald Harris, of Lutterworth Road, Northampton, was ordered by a High Court judge not to describe himself as a certified accountant or to use the letters F.A.C.C.A. in connection with his business, or to describe himself as a member of The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants.

He was also ordered to return the certificate of membership and practising certificate issued to him by the Association. The order was made on the application of the Association whose counsel told Mr Justice Cross that Mr Harris was a former member.

Mr Harris was not in Court or legally represented and had not put in a defence to the Association's claim.

Institute's New Council Members

MR B. D. BARTON, M.A., F.C.A., and Mr E. J. Frary, F.C.A., were elected to the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales at a meeting of the Council of the Institute held on Wednesday of last week (referred to on other pages in this issue). They fill the vacancies arising from the resignations of Sir William Carrington, F.C.A., and Mr C. J. M. Bennett, B.A., F.C.A., referred to in our issue of January 18th.

Mr Barton is a partner in Barton, Mayhew & Co, Chartered Accountants, of London, and was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge. His university studies were interrupted by war service, first in the private office of the Secretary of State for Air, then as private secretary to a Junior Minister in the Ministry of Fuel and Power, and later as RAF aircrew.

After the war he was articled to his uncle, the late Sir Harold Barton, F.C.A., a co-founder of his present firm, and was admitted to membership of the Institute in 1951. He became a partner in 1956.

A former chairman of the committee of the London Students' Society, Mr Barton was elected in 1953 to the Committee of the London and District Society representing those not in practice. He returned to the Committee in 1963 and in June last year was elected Chairman of the Society. In 1966–67 he served as chairman of the London Regional Technical Advisory Committee and since 1967 has been a member of the Institute's Technical Advisory Committee.

In 1956 he helped organize the first conference on management accounting at Queen's College, Oxford, and in 1966–67 was chairman of the Institute's first auditing conference held at the Hotel Metropole, Brighton.

His main interests are politics – he stood as a Conservative candidate and was defeated at Stoke-on-Trent North in the 1964 General Election – sailing and the theatre.

Mr Frary, who is a partner in the firm of Hillier, Hills, Frary & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Luton, was educated at Portsmouth Grammar School. He served his articles with Arthur Daniels & Co, of Southsea, and was admitted to membership of the former Society of Incorporated Accountants in 1948 in which year he joined his present firm then styled Lewis, Hillier & Co. He became a partner in 1950.

Actively interested in local society affairs, Mr Frary was a founder member of the Bedfordshire Branch of the Incorporated Students' Society in 1950, serving as secretary and chairman. He was also a founder member of the Beds, Bucks and Herts Branch of the London and District Society of Chartered Accountants in 1959, serving as its secretary from that date until 1963 and its chairman in 1964–65. He has been the Branch's representative on the committee of the London and District Society since 1960.

Mr Frary served throughout the Second World War in the Kensington Regiment and the Gordon Highlanders attaining the rank of Captain. He is interested in the Scout movement in Bedfordshire and in church finance, being a member of the St Albans Diocesan Board of Finance.

New Chair of Business Finance

THE new Chair of Business Finance to be endowed at the Manchester Business School by the National Westminster Bank will commit the bank to capital expenditure of £200,000 spread over seven years. The chair will be the first to be privately sponsored by a bank at a British business school, and will bring the number at the school to eight by the beginning of the 1969–70 academic year. Manchester Business School – set up in 1965 – has steadily progressed until it now has a student strength of 120 which it is anticipated will increase to 300.

Similar chairs have, of course, been sponsored by banks at universities – as distinct from business schools. For example, Midland Bank set up a Research Chair of Money and Banking at Nottingham University in 1967, and in the same year Barclays arranged to finance a Chair in Management Information Systems at the University of Warwick, the first holder being Mr R. I. Tricker, F.C.A., F.C.W.A., J.DIP.M.A.

More recently it was announced that the Jane Hodge Foundation is to endow a Chair of Banking and Finance at the University of Wales' Institute of Science and Technology, of which Mr Julian Hodge, F.A.C.C.A., is the treasurer. Mr Hodge is the chairman of the Hodge Group of banking and finance houses.

The Association's Examination Results

OF the 5,944 candidates who sat for the December 1968 examinations of The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, 1,493 (25 per cent) were successful. The names of those who passed in sections III and IV are given on other pages of this issue.

In section IV there were 823 candidates of whom 194 (23 per cent) passed. First place and prize was awarded to Mr J. C. Jones, of Kings Langley. Second place was won by Mr A. A. Lewis, of Harrow, and third place was awarded jointly to Major G. Allsopp, of London, and to Mr V. C. Evans, of Yeovil.

A total of 1,528 candidates sat for section III of whom 444 (29 per cent) were successful. First place and prize was won by Mr I. F. Jenkinson, of Sevenoaks; second place by Mr R. N. Waxman, of Isleworth, and third place by Mr J. P. G. Rivara, of Geneva.

There were 1,188 candidates for section II of whom 403 (34 per cent) passed, and in section I a total of 2,212 sat, of whom 348 (16 per cent) were successful. In the preliminary examinations 102 (63 per cent) of the 162 candidates passed.

Financing the Developing Territories

IT is a simple fact of the post-war world economy that the gap between the richer nations and the poorer grows wider not smaller, despite the very considerable inflow of investment into these territories. Part of the explanation lies in the misallocation of such investment, and part in the fact that the type of investment undertaken is often not designed to provide an effective basis for real economic growth. As one African politician is reported to have remarked, what Africa now needs is more capitalism and less nationalism!

Support for this view is provided in a new Hobart Paper, Gold and International Equity Investment (Institute of Economic Affairs, 7*s* 6*d*) by the distinguished economist, Sir Herbert Frankel, Professor of Economics of Under-developed Countries at Oxford. He points out the consequences of the open hostility to using private capital as the basis for the effective exploitation of the resources of the under-developed territories. The present alternative of international loans is inferior for two reasons: the allocation thereof is too often based upon a political decision and, to the extent that it does not generate real economic growth, the recipient is left merely with a burden of debt. In contrast, private capital is concerned to generate revenue and achieves thereby the development of the country's resources. If the investment should fail, the loss falls on the investors and not on the economy in the form of debt.

Sir Herbert advocates the extension of equity finance and rebuts the arguments used to justify its substitution by international loans. The burden of his case is that the optimum allocation of investment with the maximum benefit to the receiving country can best be achieved through the working of the capital market in directing capital to the development of natural resources. As evidence in support of this thesis, he analyses at length the experience of the South African gold mining industry and the role played in its development and growth by the private investor.

Questions in Parliament

THE shortage of accountants is the subject of a question to the President of the Board of Trade put down for answer on Wednesday, March 19th. Mr Ben Ford (Lab., Bradford North) will ask if the President is aware of the shortage, and what advice he has received from his Companies Act Accountancy Advisory Committee in this respect. Mr Ford also wants a list of members of the Committee, with their professional qualifications and the organizations or firms with which they are associated, and on what dates the Committee last met and during the preceding five years.

In another question down for answer at the same time Mr Ford is to ask on what criteria the President of the Board of Trade decides whether or not to recognize associations of accountants under section 161 (1) (a) of the Companies Act 1948.

Mr Michael Shaw (Cons., Scarborough and Whitby) intends on the same day to ask whether it remains the Government's intention to introduce another Companies Bill before the end of this Parliament.

Tax Reform

NOT all the much publicized proposals for tax reform presented to the Chancellor at this time of the year are as practicable or even as meritorious as their advocates would have us believe. A trio of lectures given at the Barking College of Technology and now published under the title Proposals for Change in the United Kingdom's System of Taxation,[1] make a number of practical suggestions for change which merit attention on grounds both of reasonableness and timing.

Mr David Cozens, B.SC.(ECON.), A.T.I.I., senior lecturer on taxation at the college, draws attention to some of the anomalies and disparities in personal taxation at home and abroad. He stresses the decline in the position of the one earner family. Income splitting, he suggests, would help restore his position as well as modifying the weight of surtax. The effect of inflation is bringing an ever increasing number of taxpayers into the income tax net since it has not been fully offset by higher reliefs or allowances. Mr Cozens argues also the case for moderating, if not removing, the discrimination against unearned income as a means of stimulating personal savings. Such a move, he avers, would bring the UK in line with other countries.

Mr Oliver Stanley reviews the impact of the 1965 Finance Act on corporate financing practices. He believes that Schedule F was introduced mainly because there was official concern about the extent of dividend-stripping and other practices. He examines the extent to which corporation tax has encouraged debt financing, the development of the convertible debenture and concludes that the recent growth of corporate debt is smaller than is generally believed. He criticizes the investment grant system and, in particular,

President's Dinner

THE President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., and the members of the Council of the Institute, entertained a number of distinguished guests at a dinner held on Wednesday of last week in the Hall of the Drapers' Company, London EC2.

the failure to link together the disincentive against corporate distribution and the incentive to selective capital investment.

Reviewing the growth in public sector expenditure and the prospect of yet further demands on taxpayer's pockets, Professor A. R. Ilersic argues the case for a broadly based outlay impost on the lines of a value added tax. He also considers swapping the present higher rates of surtax for a modified wealth tax, not least on the grounds, it would seem, that this is the only politically acceptable means of reducing the top rates of surtax.

THIS IS MY LIFE

by An Industrious Accountant

WHEN the contractors were building our new wing we saw a good bit of their accounts staff, one of whom in particular made quite an impression on our Costs section. He was brisk, accurate and co-operative; prompt with invoices and supporting vouchers and even prompter on the phone whenever our remittances in settlement were but a day outside the prescribed payment date. A ball of fire, our Costs staff called him.

So I wasn't altogether surprised when Tishy, the number two in our costing section, came to inquire about the possibility of recruiting another assistant to the section. We really could do with somebody to replace old Edward, whose arthritis had kept him a pretty permanent absentee this winter, he explained – subject to his senior's approval, of course. The section was below strength and needed assistance.

His timing was excellent. The contractors were planning to lay off staff as their construction work tapered off, our own need was self-evident, and the ball-of-fire being on good terms with our staff would be readily acceptable. Tishy didn't mention that the candidate was also a fellow member of his darts club's first team, but the grape-vine had signalled that co-incidence already.

Well, to cut the story short, the contractors' accountant gave his man a glowing tribute; he himself produced two excellent letters of recommendation from previous employers and he did well at his interview. We engaged him there and then.

He was tall and bronzed, with black curly hair, and soon became the life and soul of the section. Whether downing pints with his colleagues at the local, squiring our prettiest typist to the annual dance, or streamlining some clumsy paper work at report level, he looked like a man who'd ultimately go far.

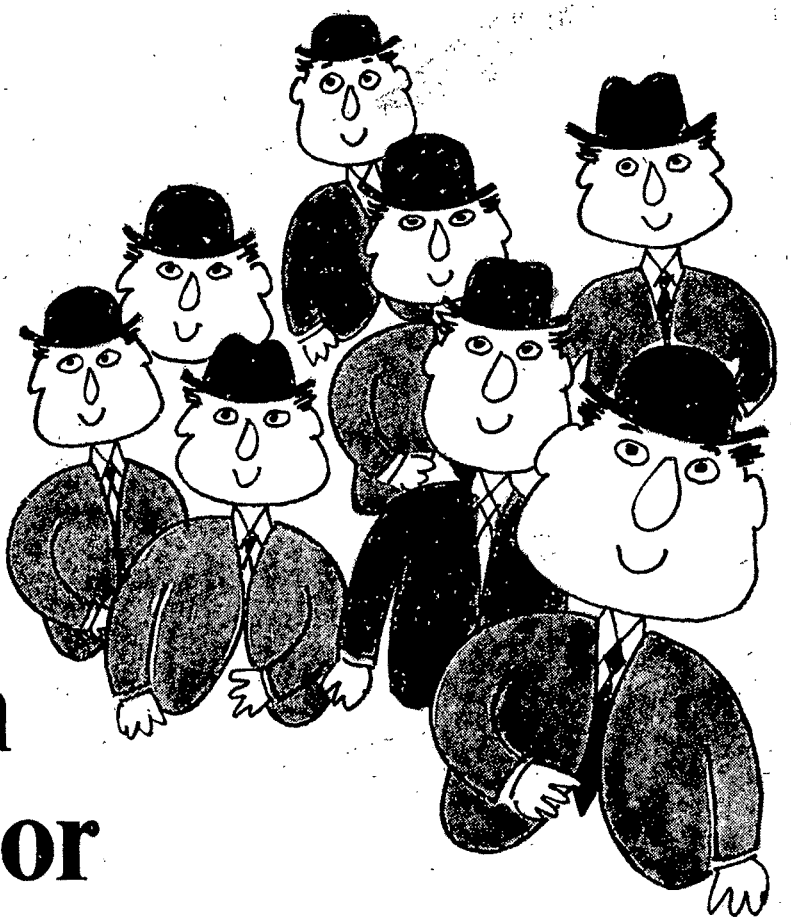
It was my turn to be surprised, therefore, when the local hotel manager telephoned me to inquire about the B.O.F's position with our company. Was he in fact, the deputy office manager? Oh, he wasn't? Well, the hotel manager hated to have to say it but his cheque had bounced for the second time, so he just wondered . . . yes, quite a big amount; it wouldn't have been accepted but for the B.O.F's explanation about his job with us.

Well, I stalled him off with the comment that there was obviously some simple explanation but I'd investigate; then I summoned Tishy for an off-the-record chat. That young man seemed strangely agitated. A garage-owner had just contacted him about another, even bigger, rubber cheque; he couldn't understand it. However, it wasn't an office matter, declared Tishy staunchly. What chaps did outside business hours was their own affair, not ours. Provided their work with us was done well and to our full satisfaction, we weren't entitled to pry into their private lives. Besides, there was bound to be some simple explanation.

I disagreed flatly. Outside office hours men still could be taken in demeanour and behaviour as representing their employers and they mustn't let us down. Accounts staff above all should be, in effect, public relations officers for their department, to put it somewhat pompously. True, even just men fall occasionally, but there are misdeeds and misdeeds – and bounced cheques come way down the line.

We were still arguing when the bank manager phoned. About that overdraft he had given the B.O.F., presumably there was no hold-up in his coming promotion; his lodgements had been surprisingly small. Perhaps I could clarify matters in view of my strong letter of recommendation in which I had mentioned the promotion. Our bank manager, being an old hand, never rushes in hastily, but his bland tone hinted at more than he was telling.

The culprit hadn't come in today, a somewhat crestfallen Tishy admitted, and his digs didn't know where he was. Perhaps that famous 'simple explanation' lay in those excellent letters which nobody here had been smart enough to check, and in those men of business who had taken a glib talker at his own valuation.



The Human Factor

The human factor is everything to a company. People—management plus efficient, loyal staff—build industries.

To hold the best people, to attract their energies and gain their loyal support, management must look to their welfare. And adequate staff pensions can play a big part. Staff can be recruited more easily and older members can be retired with dignity, their pension being provided without a drain on profits.

Pensions are not a matter of conscience. They are a contribution to business growth and efficiency.

Over 40 years of pension planning have given Sun Life a wealth of experience—and the most up-to-date techniques. We should be delighted to advise you or your broker.

Financial Policy in a Group of Companies

by L. H. BINDING, B.Com.

AT the outset it is necessary to make the essential observation that the ultimate fulfilment of any financial policy is almost entirely dependent on the collective success or failure of the policy objectives of all other functions.

The adequacy, for example, of legal agreements and patent protection, the ends to which research is directed, the translation of pilot plant experience into full-scale production units, the accuracy of capital estimating, the future availability of competent executives, production techniques and efficiencies and the forcefulness of commercial policy – all these, to a greater or lesser degree, are finally reflected in profitability and available resources, and hence have their effect on decision-making in the financial field.

The formulation of financial policy is made even more difficult by the force of external circumstances; for example, Government policies, both fiscal and economic, at home and abroad, the stimulus of competition with possible substitute products and the results of technical changes in the processes of existing and potential customers which may affect the level of demand for one's own products.

This recognition, however, of the difficulties with which the formulation of any financial policy is surrounded is nevertheless salutary, for it compels a clear definition of the objectives of any such policy, and at the same time helps to delineate the main elements of those objectives as well as specifically indicating the service which the financial function can render to other management functions.

The sections which follow, therefore, elaborate in some detail these generalizations.

General objectives

Basically, the objective of any business – with due regard to its social obligations – is to use capital, labour and management skills to produce and sell goods or services at a profit. Since capital is an indispensable factor in business operations, proper policies governing its procurement and use are just as important to the success of a business as those relating to production, sales and personnel.

Although, as already noted, financial policy is conditioned by many factors, in essence it resolves itself into devising a plan for future development within the framework of anticipated future resources and determining how those resources can best be procured.

In everyday language, any such plan must answer the two important questions: 'Where are we going?' and 'Where is the money coming from?'. In more formal terms the objectives can be stated as:

(1) The utilization of existing physical and human resources to maximize profitability.

(2) The procurement of the necessary financial resources for improvements, developments and expansion up to the optimum rate of growth, so far as is consistent with the maintenance of a sound financial structure.

(3) The utilization of future available financial resources for the attainment of management's long-termed objectives, it being assumed that these objectives will have regard to the profitable development of those resources.

Although there are innumerable implications in this statement – the more fundamental of which will be considered later – it might not be inappropriate to emphasize here and now the limiting factor of 'rate of growth' and to note that this may well be determined by the capacity of existing management to assume additional responsibilities.

If the foregoing statement of general objectives be accepted, then there follow more specific objectives, each of which must be expressed in detail. These are concerned with:

(i) profit (or income);
(ii) working capital;
(iii) future financial structure;
(iv) dividend policy;
(v) the selective allocation of available financial resources.

Each of these is considered in the paragraphs which follow.

Specific aspects of financial policy

Profit objectives

(1) General considerations

A key factor in the formulation of any financial policy must be the determination of profit objectives.

The most important factor in any positive approach must be a company philosophy, as it were, which assumes axiomatically that improvements can, at some time or another, be effected in almost every management process. The aims of management in that context will then be continuously to seek ways and means by which those improvements can be achieved.

Whilst in some respects the direction of effort will vary from company to company, there is probably a common factor applicable to all companies, namely, the need critically to examine all costs, wherever they may arise. This is necessary not only to halt what has almost become an inevitable increase in some elements of cost, e.g., administration, but also to determine areas in which economies may be made. Such areas may range from purely administrative costs to maintenance costs, to plant efficiencies and to raw material usage, to name but a few.

All departments of a company should thus be subjected periodically to an audit of efficiency.

On more fundamental matters, there will be the need to examine the profitability of a company's products and plants, to embark perhaps on policies of rationalization, to re-examine also, for example, the directions in which research should be applied and the forcefulness or aggressiveness of commercial policy.

These are but some of the factors which must receive attention if future profit objectives are to be based on factors additional to those at present used.

Beyond this, however, is the question of the adequacy of profit objectives. In a group of companies from the subsidiary company general manager's point of view, what level of profit would be regarded by the parent company as being acceptable and satisfactory? From the parent company's point of view, what does it expect from its investment and, if the profit objective appears to be continuously low, could the funds released by the sale of the assets involved be used to better advantage?

In other words, the problem facing any group is to determine – within each subsidiary company – what measures can be planned to bring profitability nearer to the desired objective and even to exceed it.

Such a programme will take time and – to be realistic – may not be achievable in every subsidiary company, due to the probable differing circumstances of each company.

That, however, only emphasizes the need both for what has been called above, 'efficiency audits', and for future profit objectives to be based on new factors.

(2) Specific targets

The general considerations examined above must now be expressed in more specific terms in order to arrive at profit targets.

The difficulties involved in attempting to forecast objectives five years hence, or of the criticisms which could be levelled against such forecasts cannot be ignored.

Nevertheless, there are a number of known factors, each of which could make a significant contribution to future improvements in profitability. There is, for example, subsidiary company management anxious to turn in good results, and – given a positive personnel policy – the stimuli provided by keen, young second line executives.

Additional benefits, too, can accrue from the employment of external consultants.

Working capital

Whilst a policy of working capital is also essential to the determination of overall financial policy, it is frequently overlooked or ignored, and for this purpose we are concerned here with trade debtors and stocks.

With regard to trade debtors, these should be related in amount to turnover and to a proper implementation of a company's policy on credit control. One must, of course, not overlook the fact that frequently a good customer may be a slow payer (taking always, for example, two months' instead of one month's credit) or that the customers of some companies may be Government departments where, again, payment may not be strictly in accordance with the company's credit policy.

It is also recognized that, in a competitive market, an easier credit policy – both at home and abroad – might be part of the cost of the operation.

Nevertheless, an inquiry may show appreciable differences in the proportion of sales outstanding at each month end as between one company and another, and there may be opportunities for a reduction in the amount of indebtedness by a stricter application of agreed policy.

Stocks are another item the levels of which should in some way also be related to the degree of activity, although due regard must be had to the necessity of ensuring adequate stocks of finished goods and also to the fact that with some companies supplies of raw materials may arrive periodically in large shipments.

Even so, there must be many cases where an investigation would disclose excess stocks.

For each of these – debtors and stocks – appropriate levels should be worked out and, periodically, actual levels measured against them to determine the cause of any increase and to agree on courses of action designed to correct the situation.

Future capital structure

No attempt to formulate a financial policy can be complete without some consideration of the manner in which, ideally, future estimated external resources should be raised.

Given an assessment of possible income and capital expenditure, and assuming that the latter is in excess of internally generated funds, the question which poses itself is how should the additional finance be raised or in other words, what should be the capital gearing of the company; that is, the relationship between equity and fixed interest capital.

So that there shall be no misunderstanding, a highly-geared capital structure may be defined as one where the fixed interest element is substantial, and a low geared one as one where the equity interest is more predominant. Thus:

	High geared (£000s)	Low geared (£000s)
Fixed capital	400	100
Equity	600	900
	1,000	1,000

With rising profits, a highly-geared structure benefits equity shareholders.

This question of capital gearing is of some importance in setting objectives for the future capital structure of a group, especially if rising profits are not just anticipated, but are being actively planned.

If additional finance is raised by means of a fixed interest stock then, with the possibility of increased dividends, a further implication of such policy would be an increase in the market price of a company's shares and hence an increase in the market value of the company.

Dividend policy

Closely related to the capital structure of the company is the dividend objective on equity capital. This in itself depends not only on available income after tax, but also on the claims of fixed interest capital, on the desired dividend cover, and hence on the relationship between distributed and retained profits.

Long-term planning

Desirability and relevance

As indicated in the opening paragraph of this article, financial policy cannot be considered in isolation, for in its ultimate expression it reflects the actions and policies of all functions.

Because of this, it is never static and the objectives may well shift as conditions change. Indeed, it would not only be unrealistic but even unwise, initially to delineate objectives and policies and then to leave matters there.

Any original objectives – whether in the field of profitability or the direction in which research is to be applied – must be kept under continuous review in an attempt to assess the future implications of change, whether these arise from internal or external causes.

One might even go further and state that frequently it is difficult to determine short-term plans in the absence of longer-termed ones. To give a specific example, it may be difficult to approve a proposal to extend or improve, say, particular plants in the absence of an assessment of the possible future developments in that product range, and a decision, based on that assessment, of how desirable or essential it is that a company stays in that field.

There is thus the need for some positive approach to long-term planning, not to fix rigid objectives but rather to indicate when, for one reason or another, alterations to previous objectives need to be made.

Thus, to give but three examples: a serious contraction in the demand for one of a group's main products, leading as it would to a severe decline in income, might affect the capital expansion programme of the group and/or the timing and method of raising new finance; if such contraction were due to appreciably superior products of a competitor, the effect might be to divert research effort from other channels which in turn could perhaps mean delays in other projects with less demand for capital in the near future; a breakthrough in research in a new field, on the other hand, could lead either to demands for even further capital, or alternatively, to the dropping of some previously agreed project in favour of the new and more promising one.

In short, the objectives of long-term planning would be:

(1) to assist in determining priorities of conflicting claims on group resources;

(2) to assist in determining future financial policy, including the extent and timing of additional capital;

(3) to assist those responsible to ensure that the executives and specialist personnel required to fulfil the plans are likely to be available;

(4) to foresee the need for future changes in the organization structure of the group.

Whilst the above is concerned very much with finance and manpower, any plan itself must be formulated with due regard to what is likely to be practicable under these two headings.

Relative factors

As already indicated, any plans for the future will be conditioned not only by internal factors but by external ones, and these are probably the more important, being sometimes difficult to foresee and even more difficult to assess.

Nevertheless, one object of conscious forward planning must be to be prepared for the unexpected, and in this connection the following factors are relevant:

(1) Technical developments relating to existing products and changes in demand therefor.

(2) The progress, prosperity and technical developments in the principal industries using the group's products.

(3) The effect of competition from other countries or suppliers of existing products or substitutes therefor.

(4) The future prosperity of Britain in particular and the world in general in the light of national political and economic policies.

(5) Political and economic plans likely to have a permanent effect on the pattern of world trade, e.g., tariff reductions and harmonization within the European Common Market.

These are some of the main factors – and there are other ancillary ones – which must be continuously considered and assessed.

Means to implementation

Given the desirability of a more positive approach to long-termed planning and a recognition of the factors to which it is subject, the question inevitably arises as to how, in practice, such a concept can be implemented so as to become a dynamic feature of financial policy, and indeed of group policy as a whole.

This, it is suggested, could best be achieved in the following ways:

(1) Many of the problems involved are primarily economic; all, however, in the last analysis must be co-ordinated and expressed in financial terms.

(2) There should be held regular (e.g., half-yearly) meetings between subsidiary company general managers and key group executives, representing the various administrative functions.

(3) These latter executives should be formed into a group executive committee and should meet periodically to make recommendations to the board on future planning objectives.

There would be no regular meetings of this body but it would meet when significant changes to previously agreed plans appeared necessary.

Contribution of the financial function

Although this article is concerned with financial policy – its determination and implementation – it would not be complete without some consideration of the service which the group financial function can and should make to assist in this process. This contribution will arise in the following ways:

(A) Direct assistance to subsidiary company managers

This will operate by:

(1) The issue each month of key data relative to each subsidiary company, the whole representing a comprehensive management data book.

This would be accompanied – but only when necessary – by a brief comment on particularly significant trends or happenings.

(2) Specific investigations carried out at the instigation of the managers.

(B) Subsidiary company operating data for group HQ

In order to fulfil the objective noted under (A) above, there should be maintained at headquarters certain detail relative to subsidiary company operating. Such data would come directly from each subsidiary.

(C) Capital expenditure control

It is further recommended here that any proposal to incur major capital expenditure should be critically examined by the financial function before being forwarded – with comments when necessary – to the group executive committee.

(D) Long-term planning

There are a number of factors which must be periodically reviewed, assessed and related to previously agreed objectives. For example, the implications of significant changes from budget (whether of income or capital expenditure), the relation of proposed capital expenditure to probable available financial resources, the effect of economic factors, changes in demand and similar considerations – all have their effect on the realistic objectives of the group in the future.

(E) Uniformity of accounting practice and terminology

For information on subsidiary companies to be most meaningful to a group executive committee and to members of the board, it is essential that throughout a group there should be complete uniformity of accounting practice and terminology.

This, too, should be a prolonged process as it has to be fitted in with existing demands on subsidiary accounting functions.

Conclusion

This article has considered the various aspects of financial policy and has recommended specific objectives in respect of it:

(1) income;

(2) capital structure;

(3) dividend policy;

(4) the utilization of available financial resources and also that some attention be given to long-term planning. Taken together, they emphasize the need for that singleness of purpose which must become operative if a group is to advance in the future.

Individual objectives, fairly determined, collectively represent a total target which, like any other target, should be attainable – but attainable only with effort. And if income objectives seem ambitious, and tests to apply to capital expenditure proposals stringent, we may do well to remind ourselves of words written many years ago: 'A man's reach must exceed his grasp, or what's a Heaven for?'.

Management Education in the USA

by DOUGLAS GARBUTT, A.C.W.A., A.C.I.S., Dip.Ed.

Readers of Mr Garbutt's earlier articles on 'Management Accounting in Europe', in these columns will doubtless be interested to see this survey of management training in the United States where he is now working as Visiting Professor of Accounting in the Southern Illinois University.

READERS of my earlier articles will not need to be reminded of the pervasive influence which the American example had has on the patterns and development of management education on a world scale.

The major expansion of management education which has occurred internationally since the Second World War has been as a result of factors which, in their Training Managers Abroad (Council for International Progress in Management, 1960), Dustan and Makanowitzky listed as:

> 'the enormous growth of industrialization everywhere, the weakening of hereditary ownership, the closing of the gap between classes in both wealth and prestige and the demand for increased productivity . . . the immediate need to find substitute executive training for men whose working experience had been curtailed by military service and who were urgently needed to fill management posts.'

Management expertise has been one of America's largest exports since the war. Foreign aid programmes and the Marshall Plan, allied with expansion of American commercial activities, has resulted in a stream of students to the United States which has been paralleled by the export of management consultants and university professors who have acted as teachers, consultants and advisers to business and indigenous management schools.

The effect of this has not always been simple and straightforward and Dustan and Makanowitzky suggest that:

> 'many nations, whilst eager to study and adopt US methods find they have much more in common with each other than they do with the US in their view of management education and training.'

No parallel

The report of a Special Committee on Education for Management (HMSO 1947) stated that 'The United States have a wealth of equipment, of experience and of trained personnel in this field to which there is no parallel in Great Britain' – a view which found ample support in the reports of the productivity teams which visited the United States in the following years. The Productivity Report on Education for Management (Anglo-American Council on Productivity, London 1951) echoed these words and noted that management education benefited from a general enthusiasm for education in America where 'of 23 million pupils in the elementary schools of the Union 90 per cent are in free public schools, 80 per cent of those leaving such schools go to secondary schools and 20 per cent of secondary school leavers go to college or university'. In 1968 it was estimated that more than 50 per cent of those leaving secondary schools were going on to college or university.

Since each State of the union has the power to provide education, each has its own system and there are in addition many privately-owned colleges and universities, although in recent years many of these have been taken over by the States or have gone out of existence for financial reasons. However, some of the best-known, such as Harvard and Princeton, are privately owned.

Features of the United States are its size and rate of growth. Between 1945 and 1965 the total civilian labour force rose from 53·9 to 73·9 million; between 1947 and 1964, the index of productivity per man hour rose from 70·9 to 120·5 and gross weekly earnings rose from $44.20 in 1945 to $102.97 in 1964. In the same period the number of certified public accountants was quadrupled. As one index of growing affluence, the number of individual share owners rose from 8·6 million in 1956 to 17·0 million in 1962.

In considering the extent of university education for business in the United States one has to bear in mind the different nature of the American university which is open to all who meet certain minimum levels and which 'combines in a peculiarly American mixture, elements of three types of European institutions: the university, the lycée or gymnasium and the non-university technical school'. (Higher Education for Business (Columbia University Press, 1960).) Apart from the fact that businessmen play a more important role in American life than in any other country, the country provides 'some combination of general and practical education to a large proportion of its citizens'.

In contrast to the three years generally taken for a first degree in Britain, the undergraduate in the USA normally takes four years and a master's degree course usually requires two years' further work. Anyone who wishes to teach must also go on to take a higher degree, requiring yet another two years of work, as well as some evidence of original research usually under the close direction of a senior member of faculty.

According to the US Office of Education, enrolments in higher education rose from 200,000 to 3 million between 1900 and 1950, and the proportion of the college age population which was in college or university rose from 4 per cent to 35 per cent in the same period. At the time, it was estimated that if the proportion rose to 50 per cent by 1970, college enrolments would be nearly 7 million. In fact, the proportion reached 50 per cent in 1968.

As the base of the college population has broadened, the background and abilities of students has diversified and the proportion of enrolments in professional rather than liberal arts programmes has increased. In 1917–18 the professional programme, of which not many were in business, accounted for 45 per cent of first degrees; by 1939–40 they had risen to 65 per cent, although they fell back slightly to 63 per cent in 1956–57.

Gordon and Howell, the authors of Higher Education for Business (supra) estimate that more than half the university students move out into business, though most of these do not have business degrees. Out of nearly 380,000 degrees in all fields awarded in 1955–56, just over 45,000 were in the field of business. In 1957–58, 55,404 business degrees were awarded. This was actually less than the post-war peak of 76,530 but it still represented a massive increase over less than 20,000 awarded in 1939–40 and less than 7,000 awarded in 1929–30. In 1919–20 the number was less than 2,000.

A report by Frank C. Pierson and others (The Education of American Businessmen (McGraw Hill, 1959)) pointed out that the spread of professional degrees in recent years has been in the newer fields of study such as teaching, business, nursing, social work and home economics.

This report divides the development of American business schools into three phases:

(1) 1880–1914 Origins and early growth

(2) 1914–1940 Expansion and diversification

(3) 1940–date Reassessment and reorganization

This latter phase may, perhaps, be regarded as having concluded in 1959–60 when both the Pierson and the Gordon and Howell (supra) reports appeared and a new era began. This era can, perhaps, be designated as the period of leadership in which business education was fully accepted into academic status.

Origins and early growth

The first period of development of education for business started with the endowment of the Wharton School in 1881 by a Pennsylvanian ironmaster, John Wharton, who proposed a 'project for a School of Finance and Economy to form a new department of the University of Pennsylvania'.

Its first director described the courses as consisting mainly of 'history, government and economics with a small nucleus of offerings in accounting, business law and business organization'. The school was part of the Arts and Sciences College until 1912.

The Amos Tuck School at Dartmouth was founded in 1900 and also emphasized the liberal arts, including such subjects as anthropological geography and modern languages even though the first director was an economist. A prerequisite for the business course was three years of undergraduate study at Dartmouth or four years elsewhere.

The foundation of Harvard Business School in 1908 may be traced back to a suggestion in 1898 that a school of diplomacy and government service be established; but at that time it was felt that there would not be sufficient demand for the graduates of such a programme. The foundation of a business school raised sharp controversy within the University on the relationship between its programmes and others in the University particularly that of political economy.

It was eventually agreed to establish a two-year graduate programme, initially under the Arts and Science Faculty because it was hoped that it would be possible to keep a close relationship with the Graduate School of Applied Science. The first dean espoused a number of unconventional ideas, especially the concept of case studies, which was developed strongly after the First World War under the second dean.

Early business schools in the United States found the easiest way to attract students was to stress accounting and office practice rather than more academic courses. Many schools had a heavy orientation towards particular trades and industries and once they developed this kind of orientation they expanded rapidly. For instance, the number of degrees awarded by Wharton increased from ten to 79 between 1900 and 1914. In the years from 1904–5 to 1914–15, enrolments at the University of Illinois rose from 85 to 420 and the faculty from five to 16.

Whilst providing a variety of courses at the practical level, Harvard stressed the need for a broad top management approach including business policy as a subject, even before 1914. It was able, during this period, to clarify for itself the main features which were to enable it to play a leading role in the next period of development.

Expansion and diversification

Between the two world wars practically every public university in the USA founded a school of business, as also did Columbia and Stanford, two of the top-ranking private universities. From 13 in 1910, the number of schools rose to 48 in 1919, to nearly 600 in 1959. In that year accredited schools of business awarded 27,000 undergraduates and 4,000 graduate degrees.

According to Pierson, this expansion occurred on the demand side 'not so much because of any well-developed educational plan but because more students were crowding in'. Adequate textbooks were not available and faculties 'brought in to teach basic courses . . . were permitted to offer advanced courses'. New branches of the curriculum emerged and instructors relied heavily on personal experience, improvisation, and trial and error. In a word, the period was much like the two decades from 1949–68 when the technical colleges developed in the United Kingdom.

The diversity of courses attracted much criticism, but Pierson suggests that three important developments took place in a small group of institutions which were of significance. These were:

(a) Closer ties with non-business subjects

Schools offering undergraduate courses devoted less than half student time to business and economics courses, leaving the balance for liberal arts courses. Certain universities such as Harvard, Michigan, Stanford, and the Amos Tuck School concentrated on graduate work, thus leaving a wide choice of undergraduate work.

Chicago University, under Dean Marshall, attempted as early as 1917 to justify the study of non-business studies. Their announcement stated:

> 'The business manager administers his business under conditions imposed by his environment, both physical and social. The student should accordingly have an understanding of the physical environment. This justifies attention to such sciences as biology, physics, chemistry and the earth sciences. He should also have an understanding of the social environment and must accordingly give attention to civics, law, economics, social psychology, and other branches of the social sciences. A knowledge of environment is not sufficient, however. It must be supplemented with a range of courses dealing with business administration wherein the student may become acquainted with such matters as the computing aids of administration . . .'

Accordingly, in their first year, students were recommended to take such courses as industrial society, geography and resources of North America, and civil government in the United States. Second-year suggestions included business psychology, value and price, labour conditions and problems, and the economic history of the United States. The third year included introduction to statistics, social control of business, and municipal government. Finally, the fourth-year recommendations ranged from trade unionism to public finance. The business courses, on the other hand, were kept to a bare minimum in the first two years, and studies in the last two years were built on top of broader courses taken earlier in related non-business fields.

(b) More precise definition of the business core

During the early twenties schools increasingly defined a business core of subjects which all students were required to have studied at least at an elementary level as a basis for later specialization. The six subjects were generally: business law, statistics, marketing, accounting, money and banking, and finance (business or corporate).

This was a major step in achieving coherence in business degrees and also in concentrating research, although it can be argued that some subjects showed little potential for development and others crystallized too soon around certain textbooks which blocked development and experimentation.

(c) Greater emphasis on company-wide management

Coherence and greater content was also introduced by the adoption of a wider viewpoint in the teaching of business subjects and this development was closely related to the development of the case method by the Harvard School of Business. Dean Donham at Harvard was a graduate of the Law School and a one-time banker who combined a practical feel for business with academic interests. He saw the task of the business manager to be making decisions in a variety of situations, and on this basis the Harvard course was developed on five principles:

(1) The two-year course concentrated on upper management decisions.
(2) Decision-making is an art, not a science; therefore assigned reading and lectures are an inappropriate teaching method.
(3) Top management, uniquely, must know enough of all facets of operations (sales, production, etc.) to keep a proper balance; have judgement to make decisions in a complex, fast-changing environment.
(4) Capacity to reason out complex problems and situations must be developed by experience in making decisions.
(5) A wide variety of carefully developed cases is the best way to stimulate the business situation. Students must be obliged to take a stand on particular issues after thorough analysis of the facts.

Dean Donham put the entire programme on a case basis and this attracted warm support of business, students, and the faculty. The cost of developing cases was prodigious: the school was spending $100,000 per annum for this purpose alone in the 1950s.

Nevertheless, the example was important and Harvard's influence vast. Stanford at graduate, and North-Western at undergraduate, level followed Harvard closely, but there were few colleges and universities who were not affected in some degree by the Harvard example.

Reassessment and reorganization

By the end of the 1940s, the business schools had won strong positions in the USA and in 1955–56 most schools were looking forward to further expansion, in some cases by more than 50 per cent in the 1970s.

Their activities had widened and they were offering new courses and majors in such fields as managerial economics, market research, forecasting, etc. Prospects of more rapid promotion and higher consultancy earnings began to attract faculty members from other fields, and the flexibility of the field must also have attracted some academics. A further influence was the growth of company management development programmes after the Second World War. Management and executive programmes for senior managers and adults in responsible jobs, whilst challenging to teachers, also attracted considerable prestige to the schools.

By this time the six most important core subjects had become accounting, economics, finance, management, marketing and production. Business law and statistics were still taught but had become relatively unimportant.

Company management development programmes

Between the wars, in-company management training in the United States was confined largely to the foreman level; managers were recruited from a company's internal labour pool and were trained on the job through experience.

By 1954, a survey of 500 companies by the American Management Association showed that 54 per cent had management development programmes. By 1958, a further survey of 350 large companies showed that 77 per cent carried on management development practices. Whilst these figures are indicative, they are by no means accurate; it is clear, however, that many companies were undertaking management training. Certainly the proportion was a great deal higher than the 50 or so in the early 1960s in the United Kingdom.

To some extent this development reflects the growing acceptance that, to quote the General Electric Company, 'managing is a distinct and professional type of work which can be taught and can be learned'. It also reflects the increasing body of knowledge in various techniques of management in the business schools, consultants and the companies themselves. One might instance the development of such techniques as network and critical path analysis.

New problems

A considerable problem now arises through the increasing tendency of companies to recruit college graduates as the main, if not the only, source of managers. Whilst the rising proportion of the population attending college greatly promotes this tendency it also increases the difficulties which able non-graduates experience in securing promotion. These difficulties are further increased by the lack of systematic management and appraisal systems which may overlook practical, in favour of academic, qualifications. Many companies have tried to eliminate these losses by encouraging individuals to appraise themselves and to propose means of future development.

It may also seem contradictory that internal management development and training should be growing at the same time as the colleges and universities are turning out more graduates than ever before. But there are two lines of argument in this; the growth of internal courses may be justified on the grounds that the rate of technological change in business is such that all managers need to be trained and retrained several times during a life-time. There is also the argument that the broad basis of education should be such that little or no specific training should be undertaken by institutions of higher learning; practical skills and knowledge of individual firms and their organization should be acquired on the job through experience and/or training.

A natural division of function thus appears: the college undertaking generalist studies, and the company training for integration of its managers into its own organization and for supplementation of their knowledge in general and specialist fields.

There is a danger here that in dividing education and training between the university and the business firm, a gap is created which could widen and even become unbridgable over time. This could raise a demand for mechanisms to encourage communications between businessmen and academics. On the other hand, it could lead to a permanent estrangement which might raise demands for the abolition of business education since if it is not of practical value there might seem to be no particular advantage in undertaking business studies in a university context.

Current issues

Despite the extensive developments in the United States, complaints from management about graduates of business schools still abound. It is said that teaching standards are often low; programmes are designed for poor or even mediocre students; they aim at first job rather than long-term development needs of executives, and the schools fail to develop the qualities of mind and character necessary to a competent executive. Many of these criticisms, indeed, have come from within the schools themselves. Some deans have questioned whether the 'core' was not more of a hindrance than a help to future development.

Employers, too, have displayed contradictory attitudes. Top managers have questioned whether a liberal arts aducation was not a better preparation for business than a business degree. On the other hand, there has been evidence from the colleges that, in practice, company recruiters who have come from the ranks of middle managers select on the basis of knowledge of particular subjects relevant to the first jobs of recruits.

There has also been some reaction to the stressing of the overall managerial viewpoint by the schools, and the present writer attended a conference of Illinois accounting teachers at Peoria last October, at which a representative of a large accounting firm complained that even accounting majors 'were unable to complete a simple journal entry'.

The establishment of new programmes by Carnegie Technical College, Chicago and Massachusetts Institute of Technology at the graduate level, for which the best undergraduate training seemed to be in the non-business fields, e.g., history, mathematics, economics and literature, has also put business schools on the defensive.

Rising enrolments and the emergence of night schools, junior colleges, and in-company training programmes have led to a shortage of business faculties. This in its turn has persuaded many schools to concentrate their energies more at the graduate level and to leave undergraduate work to the liberal arts and other fields.

Managers in the USA

The population of the United States is about four times that of the United Kingdom in which the working population in 1965 was about 25 million.

It is not easy to estimate how many Americans are managers, but in the 1960 report Gordon and Howell quoted various definitions of managers and by selecting all those jobs which seemed relevant, from the 'professional, technical and kindred' and the 'managers, officials and proprietors' categories mentioned in the 1950 census, they estimated the total number of managers at 6,600,000, plus about 750,000 foremen. If engineers and salesmen were excluded, the total fell to about 4½ to 5 million. If some of the salesmen and self-employed were excluded, the total was still about 3·8 million and this ignored those in public service.

Gordon and Howell dismissed as 'too restrictive' an estimate by Daniel Wolfle (America's Resources of Specialized Talent, 1954), of 1,372,000 managers, since he singled out occupations which 'must have had extensive formal education' and must 'require reasonably high intelligence'. The effect of this was to confine the group to professional accountants and 'the more generalized management group'.

Finally, Gordon and Howell took a figure of 2,700,000 and from this they calculated a need for about 110,000 new businessmen a year, rising to perhaps 150,000 per annum in the 1960s and higher in the 1970s. Assuming that the proportion of non-business graduates going into business would continue to rise, they expected a rise in the graduate proportion of business managers.

Management training problems in Britain

It might not be amiss to conclude this article by a visiting British observer of the American management scene to comment that American experience seems to pose a number of problems for business and management education in the United Kingdom, of which the following is by no means an exhaustive list:

(1) What should be the relative roles of the technical college and the universities? Should either of them offer heavily vocational courses in business?

(2) What is the best balance between general and vocational studies? Is there, indeed, any place for vocational studies in educational institutions?

(3) To what extent are business and management studies more appropriate to postgraduate rather than undergraduate work?

(4) What is the correct division of education and training between business and the educational institutions? Does education have any role to play in the development of managers or should it concentrate on pre-experience education?

(5) Can a common core of business subjects be identified and, if so, can agreement be reached on including them in college and university courses?

(6) What is the role of the professional body in relation to the admission, say, of accountants to the profession and in the stipulation of specific content in degrees obtained by would-be entrants? To what extent is accounting part of a common core of educational subjects? Is it necessary knowledge for managers? Does it have the status of an intellectual discipline or is it an art best taught in practice?

Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

Board of Trade v. British Oxygen Co Ltd

In the Court of Appeal

Investment grant – Manufacture and sale of goods – Delivery in large and small tankers – Whether machinery or plant – Whether vehicle constructed or adapted for conveying incorporated machine – Tractor for transporting steel cylinders – Detachable half-trailer with cylinders left with customer – Whether tractor a vehicle – Whether tractor a vehicle constructed as above – Whether trailer and cylinders qualify for grant – Whether cylinders each costing less than £25 qualify – Rate of grant – Industrial Development Act 1966, sections 1, 7, 13.

The appellant company's main activity, the manufacture and delivery of industrial and medical gases, required that the gases should be delivered in special containers to the purchaser's premises. Liquid gases had to be preserved at low temperatures, and in the tankers transporting them the pressure of the gas within the container could be twice atmospheric pressure; while gases sold in gaseous form, and in particular hydrogen, had to be transported and delivered at very high pressures.

The company used three kinds of transporter. The first was a large tender consisting of a tractor and a half-trailer. The tractor, a four-wheeled vehicle, included a turntable. The half-trailer was detachable from the tractor, and connected with the turntable on the tractor, and it was fitted with jacks to support its front when it was detached. The container for the gas was a part of the half-trailer, as was also the equipment for keeping the gas at a low temperature and for pumping the gas under higher pressure into the customers' storage tanks.

The second kind of transporter was a smaller one. It consisted of a four-wheeled chassis of an ordinary kind, with a non-detachable vacuum-insulated tank with equipment similar to that of the half-trailer of the large transporter.

The transporters of the third kind consisted of a tractor and a half-trailer. The latter carried, between two bulkheads, nine steel cylinders containing hydrogen under a pressure of up to one and a half tons to the square inch. This half-trailer was detachable from the tractor, and was frequently left with the customer, so that he might draw gas from the cylinders as he wanted it. The half-trailer had jacks at the front to support it when detached.

Another type of equipment involved in the case consisted of the cylinders, which were of various sizes. A rental was generally charged to the customer for the use of cylinders while in his possession. The cylinders cost on average about £20. They were bought in large quantities, and in the three accounting periods ended September 30th, 1968, the total of such expenditure would exceed £4 million.

It was agreed that the expenditure on all four types of equipment was capital expenditure. The matters in dispute were (1) whether the transporters were vehicles, (2) if so, whether they were constructed or adapted to convey an incorporated machine, so as to qualify as 'machinery or plant' in section 13 (1) of the Industrial Development Act 1966 (3) whether, if machinery or plant, they were provided for a process for or incidental to the making of gas for the purpose of the company's business, within section 1 (2) of the Act, (4) whether all the expenditure was for storage in the course of the company's business within section 1 (3) (b) of the Act, or for packing in the course of the business within section 1 (3) (c). The final question was whether the Board of Trade was entitled to refuse a grant for the expenditure on cylinders solely because each cylinder cost less than £25.

Held (reversing the judgment of Mr Justice Buckley at (5), (6) and (8), The Accountant, May 18th, 1968): none of the hydrogen half-trailer was machinery or plant; it was lawful for the Board of Trade to refuse a grant for the cylinders because each cylinder cost less than £25.

C.I.R. v. Barclay Curle & Co Ltd

In the House of Lords

(Before Lord REID, Lord HODSON, Lord GUEST, Lord UPJOHN and Lord DONOVAN)

Income tax – Capital allowance – Machinery or plant – Initial allowance – Construction of dry dock – Whether plant – Whether cost of excavating qualifies – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 265, 276 and 279 – Finance Act 1956, section 16.

The company incurred capital expenditure on the construction of a new dry dock at Elderslie. Land had to be excavated in order to form the dock, and the walls were constructed of concrete. There were pumps and machinery for the purpose of freeing the dock from water, of holding the ship securely while under repair and of filling the dock with water again.

The company claimed that the whole dock was plant within section 279 of the Income Tax Act 1952, and thus qualified for the initial allowance given by that section for machinery and plant. The Inland Revenue contended that the dock was not plant, but was a building in which plant was housed; and that, alternatively, the cost of excavating the land to take the dock was not a qualifying expense.

The Special Commissioners decided that the whole dock was plant but that the excavation expenditure did not qualify for the allowance.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Session (Lord Hodson and Lord Upjohn dissenting)): the dock as a whole was plant for this purpose; and the expense incurred on excavation was a part of the total qualifying expenditure.

Introduction to Binary Arithmetic

by R. E. ELLMER, M.A.(Cantab.), F.C.A., A.C.I.S.

Learning to count in binary

IF the two-toed sloth could count it would undoubtedly use the binary (counting in twos) scale, just as the human being who can count uses the denary (counting in tens) scale because of his ten-fingered characteristic. By the same token, the octopus would presumably use the octal (counting in eighths) scale. However, this is the age of the computer and great interest is accordingly being focused on the binary scale. It is the purpose of this article to explain how this scale is formed, how it may be manipulated and how conversion from denary to binary – and vice versa may be performed. (It is proposed to deal with the octal scale in a later article).

It is said that students of 'modern' mathematics – which subject includes a study of the earliest form of numbering techniques practised among primitive peoples, viz. 'one, two, many' – are now referring to Henry VIII as Henry Octal and writing his name as Henry 10, which is how the name would appear in the octal scale. After all, we are very familiar with the Roman numerals VIII as Henry's number sequence, and tend to shudder when he is designated by the Arabic 8. So why not become as familiar with Henry 10 in octal and Henry 1000 in binary, as we are with Henry VIII in Roman? Historians would probably agree that, had the matter been drawn to his attention, Henry himself would have revolted against the idea of being stuck with a Roman tag!

To understand the properties of the binary scale, we should begin by learning to count in twos. Let us commence with a study of the first seven numbers, thus:

Denary	Binary
2	10
3	11

The first step in learning the sequence is to note what happens when an extra figure is added as we move up from 1 to 2 in denary, which is equal to the move from 1 to 10 in binary, i.e., a zero is added to binary 1 so that two 'places' are now in use.

To increase by a further 1 produces 11 in binary and 3 in denary, and so the two places in binary are now filled. In order, therefore, to increase by a further unit in binary, it is necessary to take on another place, so as we pass to 4 in denary and we arrive at 100 in binary.

The process now repeats itself and we have 101, 110, and 111 in binary as the equivalents of 5, 6 and 7 in denary. Three places having been filled in binary, we have to take on, as usual, another place and so we come to 1000 in binary as the equivalent of 8 in denary.

Four places in binary are now 'operational' and we accordingly move through 1001, 1010, 1011, 1100, 1101, 1110 and 1111, i.e., through 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15 in denary. The four places used in moving from 1000 to 1111 now being exhausted, we accordingly have to take on another place, and move into binary 10000 as the equivalent of denary 16; then we proceed to 'fill up' one by one the five places now available, which takes us up to 31 in denary, i.e., 11111 in binary. The results so far may be tabulated thus:

Denary	Binary
8 ($=2^3$)	1000
9	1001
10	1010
11	1011
12	1100
13	1101
14	1110
15	1111
16 ($=2^4$)	10000
17	10001
18	10010
19	10011
20	10100
21	10101
22	10110
23	10111
24	11000
25	11001
26	11010
27	11011
28	11100
29	11101
30	11110
31	11111

A number of points may now be brought to the attention of the reader, viz:

(i) At each stage when the denary number is equal to a new power of two, a further figure is added to the row of binary digits.

(ii) The new figures so formed is always 1 plus the number of zeros equal to the power itself, e.g. $2^1(=2)=10$ (i.e. the power is one and there is 1 zero); $2^2(=4)=100$ (i.e., the power is 2 and there are 2 zeros); $2^3(=8)=1000$ (i.e. the power is three, and there are 3 zeros), and so on.

(iii) In expanding the pattern of binaries, it is useful to concentrate on the last two places, noting how they are filled first before bringing the third (i.e., third from the right) place into use and how these three places are then filled in the same way as was done for the digits (in denary) from 4 to 7. In fact, it is as well to keep the 4 to 7 pattern constantly in one's mind and to commit the following 'block' to memory:

This 'block' of numbers is constantly repeated in the binary pattern and practice in the next block, i.e., from 8 to 15 in denary (1000 to 1111 in binary) will enable the student to master the formation of numbers in the binary scale.

(iv) The use of the relationship between the denary powers and the binary zeros is invaluable in checking the accuracy of the binary number itself because, as was shown in (ii) above, the number of zeros in binary equals the power to which denary 2 must be raised in order to produce the required binary number.

Converting denary to binary

A number in the denary scale may be converted into the equivalent number in the binary scale by the simple process of repeated division by 2 and by taking note of the remainders obtained at each division which, when set out in reverse order, produces the binary number required. The following examples will demonstrate the method:

(i) Convert 365 into binary:

2	182+1	↑
2	91+0
2	45+1
2	22+1
2	11+0	= 101101101

An alternative method is to employ the 'two-squared' table, which may be very easily memorized for all squarings of 2 up to, say, 2^{10}, as follows:

$2^2=4$	$2^5=32$	$2^8=256$
$2^3=8$	$2^6=64$	$2^9=512$
$2^4=16$	$2^7=128$	$2^{10}=1024$

Now 365 lies between 2^8 and 2^9, and we therefore have:

		365
2^8	(1+8 zeros)	= 256	= 100000000
	Balance	109

109 lies between 2^6 and 2^7, and we therefore have:

2^6	(1+6 zeros)	= 64	= 1000000
	Balance	45

45 lies between 2^5 and 2^6, i.e.

2^5	(1+5 zeros)	= 32	= 100000
	Balance	13	= 1101
	Total (as before)		101101101

(ii) Convert 112 into binary:

2	112
2	56+0	↑
2	28+0
2	14+0	= 1110000

To check the result, the 'two-squared' method may be employed as with (i) above, or the binary figure may be converted back into denary, as will be dealt with in the following section.

Converting binary to denary

Converting a binary number into its denary equivalent is in reality a process of evaluating the position which each 0 or 1 takes up in a row of digits in the binary scale. The evaluating process operates by giving effect to the fact that every time a binary digit moves from right to left, a multiplication by two takes place. For example, consider the binary number 1111, and write it down in such a way that the power to which each digit is raised in order to represent its denary equivalent may be clearly seen and we have:

(2^3)	(2^2)	(2^1)	(1)

from which it may be seen that:

$$1111=2^3+2^2+2^1+1=15$$

If zeros occur in the binary number, as in 1001, we have:

(2^3)	(2^2)	(2^1)	1

and remembering that $2^2\times0=0$, and $2\times0=0$, we have:

$$1001=2^3+0+0+1=9$$

To take a further example, consider the binary number 1111101001. It occupies ten places and as the second place from the right is always a '2' place, the third from the right is always a '2^2' place, the fourth a '2^3' place, the tenth will always be a '2^9' place. With ten places to consider we may therefore write down the denary equivalent at speed as follows:

2^8	256
2^7	128
2^6	64
2^5	32
	1,001 (denary)

It will be observed that proceeding from 2^9 to 2^8, etc., is only a halving process and therefore if we remember, as suggested, that 2^{10} is 1024, we can deal with conversions at some speed by doubling when we have to go above 2^{10} and halving when we go below – always remembering, of course, that a zero in binary can only produce a zero in denary.

by A. J. MERRETT and M. R. M. WHITE.

Gower Press, 63*s*.

Executive bonus schemes in Britain are relatively rare and too many of the few that do exist are ineffective. American companies, by contrast, believe in bonus schemes (both income and capital types) and try to ensure that they are based on logical and equitable principles, besides offering worth-while incentives. But at least one reason why British companies have been slow in introducing effective bonus schemes is the difficulty they encounter in deciding what constitutes good modern practice. Professor Merrett and Mr White have done an excellent job in providing the necessary facts, recommendations and practical examples. There is no longer any room for a plea of ignorance.

The layout of the book makes it very readable as it almost takes the form of a detective story. Thus it starts with a survey of existing practice in the United Kingdom based on eight specific but anonymous companies. It identifies the crime, that is, of not recognizing the need for incentive at the top, which may result in squandering the available money in the form of across-the-board 'Christmas boxes' which urge to nothing but are resented if omitted.

Then it sets out very clearly why performance-related remuneration can relate earnings to maximum performance, while unrelated remuneration is normally a payment for minimum performance. It postulates workable formulae for bonus schemes for individual executives and their supporting staff, and faces up to the administrative problems. Finally the whole second half of the book invites the reader to examine each of the eight case studies in detail and to decide how much of a crime has been committed by each.

The treatment really does sustain the suspense until the end, while the case studies themselves have the comforting effect of showing that even the better companies have not done all the things that they should have done.

There are many other good things about the book; there are also two small bad ones. To get these out of the way they are price: three guineas does seem a bit much for 200 pages of normal letterpress with only a moderate number of tables and charts; and typographical errors: there are enough of these to irritate the average reader in a quality-priced product.

But to revert to good points: the style is simple, straightforward; there is excellent uniform treatment of the eight cases so that they really can be compared; and there is the general practical approach. Prospective readers should have no fear either of the complexities of the subject or of the need for all bonus schemes to be complicated. On several occasions the authors say quite clearly that where there is an effective system of budgetary control, all but the largest businesses may safely start by relating bonus to performance against budget.

There is, indeed, a bonus within the book for the accountant, in the chapter on 'New Developments in Capital-based Remuneration'. This contains a strong plea for a relaxation of fiscal rules to enable share option schemes to be put to work as management incentives. This is followed up by a clear description of three possible alternative ways of achieving similar results. This chapter at least should be compulsory reading for financial advisers.

Improving Hotel Profitability

Northwood Industrial Publications, 35*s*

Management techniques which have gained acceptance in the industrial field are here applied to a service industry and although the consequent difficulties of employing a scientific approach to problems that are more often solved empirically are somewhat avoided in this volume, the authors have provided a basis upon which a new generation of hotel management can be trained.

The authors have a wide experience in the field and their work reflects the practical aspects of the subject as well as the strict theory. In all, this is a book both for those concerned in the trade and for all those who look askance at the modern approach to service industries.

Charlesworth's Company Law

Ninth edition by T. E. CAIN, M.A., Barrister-at-law.

Stevens & Sons, 40*s*, paperback 18*s* 6*d*.

The passing of the Companies Act 1967 has necessitated the revision of a number of standard texts on company law. Charlesworth has been familiar to several generations of students since it first appeared in 1932, and is eminently suited to the needs of accountancy students no less than those of the Law Society or the Bar. Within an acceptable (though increasing) compass, the subject-matter is set out in paragraphs of readable length, and no topic of importance has been omitted – though to be sure there is a somewhat excessive dependence upon footnotes, over eighty of them in the 25 pages of Chapter X alone.

Within the vast field of company law there is room for legitimate differences of opinion as to the order in which the material is dealt with: the learned author refers to this in his preface, but occasionally fails to avoid detail difficulties. For example, we are told on page 116 that the share premium account may be applied (inter alia) towards a premium payable on the redemption of redeemable preference shares; but the reader is not introduced to such shares until page 136, in the subsequent chapter. Notwithstanding the particular needs of Bar students (whom accountants must surely envy at this point!) it is questionable whether five pages on 'Taxation' really justify their treatment as a separate chapter, and similar remarks could apply to the three pages on 'Unit Trusts.'

Join the BARCLAYCARD Company Card Scheme!

Your Company does not have to bank with Barclays to be eligible. There is no enrolment fee, or annual service charge. BARCLAYCARDS will be issued free to your Executives and Representatives, either in the name of your Company, with the holder as the authorised signatory, or in the holder's own name. In either case on presentation of his card the BARCLAYCARD holder will be able to sign for services or goods at over 40,000 hotels, garages, restaurants, airlines and shops throughout Britain. (More places are joining at the rate of over 500 a month.)

Travel.

BARCLAYCARDS are particularly useful for settling expenses whilst travelling and all cardholders enrolled in our Company Card scheme will be issued with a copy of our special Travel Directory which lists airlines, restaurants, hotels, garages, service stations, tyre depots and car hire companies throughout the British Isles. Should your cardholders travel abroad, arrangements have already been made for BARCLAYCARD to be accepted for a wide range of services in U.S.A., Canada, Japan, South Africa, Malta, Gibraltar and the Irish Republic. (Subject to current Exchange Control Regulations.)

Getting cash without notice.

On presentation of his card at any branch of Barclays,* the cardholder can draw up to £25 in cash on his BARCLAYCARD account. He simply signs a Cash Advance Voucher, and keeps a copy. This is the only facility for which a charge is normally made (2½% on the amount withdrawn).

Monthly Statements.

We send out monthly statements, together with copies of the Sales Vouchers and full settlement is required within 25 days of the statement date.

The advantages of the scheme are:—

1. The card is a great asset for business entertaining and travelling, as it eliminates any need to carry large sums of cash.
2. The monthly statements and copy sales vouchers, provide a clear, regular record of expenditure—how much, on what, and where. This can save your executives time in preparing their expense accounts and your Company time in checking them, making your book-keeping simpler, too.

3. Your Company can settle all its Representatives' accounts with a single monthly cheque.
4. It costs nothing to join the scheme, and the service itself costs nothing either, except when the card is used to draw cash, or the account is not settled in full within the specified 25 day period.

BARCLAYCARD is accepted in more places, and is held by more people, in Britain, than all the other credit cards combined.

Pensions for the Self-employed

by GEORGE PARFITT, M.B.E., T.D.
Chairman of Time Assurance Society.

THE recent White Paper has emphasised, if emphasis were necessary, that unless the Self-Employed make adequate provision for their own retirement then nobody else is going to.

Total Tax Exemption

The answer, and there is one, to the pension problem of the Self-Employed is contained in Section 22 of the Finance Act, 1956, when tax reliefs were granted which can only be described as unparalleled in their generosity.

Any Self-Employed person, and that includes Controlling Directors and persons employed in a job without a pension, can save towards his retirement an annual sum of up to 10% of his net relevant earnings and obtain total tax exemption at the highest rate of tax paid. If an annual saving of £100 is taken as an example then a person paying tax at the Standard Rate of 8/3d in the £ can obtain tax relief amounting to £32. 3. 0d per annum, and a Surtax payer, paying at the highest rate, saving £100 per annum towards his retirement can obtain tax relief amounting to £91. 5. 0d.

One of the conditions is that the savings for retirement must be made with a Life Office whose Retirement Annuity Contract has received approval from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The savings made and accumulated by the Life Office are then invested in a tax free fund – free from Income Tax, free from Corporation Tax and free from Capital Gains Tax.

The resultant pensions can only be described as somewhat unbelievable, and it is difficult to imagine why the Finance Act, 1956, has been on the Statute Book for more than twelve years without very much publicity until Time Assurance Society decided two years ago to bring them forcibly to the notice of the Self-Employed in a National Press campaign.

Example

A Self-Employed person aged 40 next birthday saving up to 10% of his earned income, say £200 per annum, for a Pension Bond will receive tax relief amounting to £64. 6. 0d each year.

At age 65 his 25 annual contributions will have cost him £3,392 net over the period of 25 years.

On his 65th birthday he will commence to receive an annual pension, including estimated bonuses, of £1,383 per annum paid monthly in advance.

The pension will be treated as earned income and enjoy earned income relief.

As a hedge against inflation the pensioner will continue to participate in the profits of the Society and the bonuses which his savings have earned will continue to be added to his pension after retirement. This means that his pension after five years of retirement would have grown to £1,489. 8. 0d per annum, and after ten years to £1,595. 16. 0d per annum.

According to the latest statistics, the average male on attaining age 65 has a life expectancy of another 14 years so he should, on average, receive total pension payments of £21,298, but in any case the pension is payable for as long as he lives.

The Purpose of the Act

Retirement Annuities under the Finance Act, 1956 may not be surrendered, assigned or commuted for cash – neither of course may the State pension. The intention of the Act is quite plain – extremely generous tax reliefs are granted in order to provide a pension at retirement. The reliefs are most emphatically not given for the purpose of accumulating a tax free capital gain.

In contradistinction to the Pension Scheme proposed in the recent White Paper, the main who was unfortunate anough to be born too soon is not penalised. The older man born before 1916 is permitted to make tax free savings towards his pension on an increasing sliding scale up to a total of 15% of his net relevant income, if he was born in 1907 or earlier.

The amounts of premium permitted to be paid each year are a maximum of £750 for the man or woman born in 1916 or later, and £1,125 for a person born in 1907 or earlier.

Planning and Pricing for Decimalization

by DAVID S. DUNBAR.

Gower Press, 35*s*.

The real 'profit or loss' problems of pricing in decimals are clearly illustrated in a book which appeared exactly two years before D-Day, February 15th, 1971. The author is Associate Director of J. Walter Thompson, advertising agents to the Decimal Currency Board.

Although David Dunbar's book puts forward solutions to all the business problems of decimalization – marketing, accounting, machine change-over, staff and customer training, etc. – he devotes more space to pricing than to any other single subject. Product pricing in decimals is not just a matter of making the correct mental arithmetic; almost all conversions from old pence into new pennies involve an unavoidable loss either to the buyer or the seller.

The best chance of avoiding loss of customers on one side and loss of profits on the other is to plan price and weight relationships well in advance of 1971. Which means now. David Dunbar gives a table of 'good', 'bad' and 'indifferent' price points classified according to the degree to which they can be converted into decimals without unreasonable profit or loss to buyer or seller.

Finance and Commerce

Grand Metropolitan

GRAND Metropolitan Hotels Ltd is a high sounding title, but since its early days as a public company the group has grown to its title in no uncertain manner. Five years ago capital employed was just under £15 million, whereas now it is over £46 million (although admittedly after a property revaluation). Profits five years ago were £1·84 million, whereas last year they were £4·45 million before loan charges. Profits before tax have risen from £1·63 to £3·9 million.

It is interesting also to see that despite the property valuation written into the accounts, the profits – before interest – as a percentage of average capital employed have only dropped from 13·4 to 12·3 per cent in the five-year period. Originally almost entirely confined to operating hotels in London, the Grand Metropolitan company, while having 20 London hotels, has seven in Ireland, eight in Scotland, one in Brussels, three in France, one in Monaco, one in Spain and (the most recent acquisition) one in New York.

In addition, the company owns the Chef and Brewer licensed house organization, has two substantial industrial catering subsidiaries and through Holsten Distributors, is sole UK agent for the products of the Holsten Brewery of Germany. Associated companies include Centre Hotels (Cranston) and De Vere-Grand Metropolitan which owns the Connaught Rooms, London.

Revaluation

As at the balance sheet date, 'certain of the group's hotel properties in England and Scotland' were professionally revalued on a going concern basis by Healey & Baker, and the hotel properties in France and Monaco were similarly revalued by Jones, Lang, Wootton. The surplus over book values was about £14·4 million and the revaluation was incorporated into the 1968 accounts.

Note 1 to the profit and loss account refers to changes in the basis of accounting which acknowledge the substantial increase in funds needed to finance developments and leads to the separate indication of the interest charges involved. Rationalization of the amortization and depreciation of Tax liabilities if hotels were sold

There is no present intention of selling any of the hotels which were revalued as at 30th September, 1968 and no provision has been made for any tax which might be payable if such sales took place. It is estimated that if all these hotels had been sold on 30th September, 1968 at the amounts at which they were revalued the tax liability which might have arisen would not have exceeded approximately £3·8 m.

Guarantees

In addition to the guarantee referred to in note 9, the parent company has guaranteed the following borrowings of associated companies:

(a) A bank loan of £1,350,000 to The Kennedy Hotel Limited.

Notes on the Consolidated Profit and Loss Account for the year ended 30th September, 1968

1. Changes in basis of Accounting

There have been two changes in the basis of accounting as compared with the previous year:

(i) Interest charges attributable to properties in course of development (see note 4).

Because of the substantial increase in the funds needed to finance the development of hotels and licensed premises, the directors consider that it would be clearer to show the consolidated results for the year before charging interest on such funds during the period of development. This interest, less tax relief, has been written off in the consolidated profit and loss account after arriving at the results for the year.
To facilitate comparison, the figures for the previous year have been altered to reflect the new basis of dealing with such interest.

(ii) Amortisation and depreciation

The basis for amortisation and depreciation of fixed assets in the various group companies has been rationalised during the year. As a result, the charge to revenue has been reduced by about £96,000 compared with the charge which would have resulted had the basis applying in the previous year been continued. Details of the new basis of amortisation and depreciation are given in note 2.

2. Amortisation and Depreciation

All replacements of furniture and equipment in hotels and licensed premises are charged to revenue.

No depreciation is provided on freehold properties or on their furniture and equipment.

Leasehold properties, including their furniture and equipment, are amortised over the last 50 years of the lease or the length of the lease, if shorter. Certain of the properties revalued at 30th September, 1968 were leasehold properties. This will result in an increase in the charge for amortisation of approximately £145,000 during the year ending 30th September, 1969.

The cost of styling the interiors of Chef and Brewer houses and of other equipment of the group is depreciated at rates estimated to reduce book values to nil at the end of the useful lives of the assets.

3. Trading Profit

(i) The trading profit after charging amortisation and depreciation includes a year's profit (£193,544) for the new subsidiary, Midlands Counties Industrial Catering Company Limited; and £104,531 in respect of the subsidiary wine group for the period from 1st October, 1967 to 31st March, 1968 (the effective date of sale).

(ii) The geographical analysis of sales and trading profit after charging amortisation and depreciation is as follows:

	1968 External sales	1968 Trading profit	1967 Trading profit
	£000's	£000's	£000's
United Kingdom	32,010	4,095	3,246
France and Monaco (see note 13)	2,251	252	252
	34,261	4,347	3,498

(iii) Trading profit is stated after crediting income from quoted investments of £19,998 (1967—£14,034) and after charging:

(iv) The chairman received emoluments of £10,801 in 1968. Three directors waived fees amounting in all to £2,208. The following table shows the number of directors whose emoluments during 1968, excluding pension contributions, fell within each £2,500 range:

6. Unappropriated Profit

The balance carried forward is dealt with in the accounts of the parent company and its subsidiaries as follows:

	1968 £000's	1967 £000's
Parent company	1,675	1,314
Subsidiaries	1,357	841

fixed assets has been introduced and the basis is explained in Note 2 to the profit and loss account.

The hotel industry is recognized as one of the biggest of 'invisible export' earners but, like other invisible exporters, is given little Government encouragement. But in their report the directors state under the heading of 'Exports' that on the basis of detailed records in certain of the company's London hotels, 44 per cent of the guests were from foreign countries.

New hotels

Reviewing 1967–68 activities, Mr Maxwell Joseph, the chairman, reports that all divisions of the group – with the exception of the hotels in France and Monaco which were affected by the political unrest last May and June – showed higher profits. British hotels produced record figures and earnings from industrial catering are on a rising trend.

Money was raised by a rights issue during the year and since the end of the year under review the company's interest in GM Wine Supplies was sold with effect from April 1st, 1968. GM is a major wine shipping and distributing organization and the intention was to integrate it with the hotel operation. Attempts were made to computerize stock control and distribution but this proved a difficult operation. Mr Joseph says the board is satisfied that the funds released by the sale can be employed more remuneratively elsewhere. A further substantial capital profit has been made by the realization of a small proportion of the holding in Centre Hotels (Cranston).

Against these realizations, new investment has been, and still is, heavy. Between October and December 1968 the company acquired a further 39 per cent of the share capital of its French subsidiary, bringing the holding to over 91 per cent. In addition, 95 per cent of Hotelera el Carmen SA, a Spanish hotel company, has been bought, and, shortly before the accounts were issued, the company announced the purchase of the 1,300-room Manhattan Hotel in New York.

Property build-up

Grand Metropolitan Hotels has a key interest in the Grosvenor Square area of London where the company's Europa Hotel is and where The Britannia is due to open this spring. It is interesting to see the company's property build-up in this area. Mr Joseph says: 'Some months ago the company purchased the head-lease of 48 Grosvenor Square and 12 Carlos Place and we have since acquired or contracted to acquire similar interests in Nos 45–47 Grosvenor Square, No. 13 Carlos Place and Nos 45, 46, 47 and 48 Adams Row. This substantial block adjoins The Britannia and this consolidates our position in this very valuable area'.

In another key London area an important site at the corner of Cromwell Road and Gloucester Road in South Kensington has been acquired. The site is almost opposite the BEA Air Terminal and the plan is to build 'London's largest hotel comprising 2,100 bedrooms, 100 flats, a parade of shops and 23,000 sq. ft of office accommodation.' Planning application has been made for the project.

Apart from its own new developments in hand and planned, the company is 'considering a number of further profitable acquisitions which, together with the developments now on hand should ensure the group's continued prosperity for many years to come'.

Preliminary figures

INTERIM and preliminary statements by companies take many and varied forms, though, so long as the statements have a common denominator of clarity, the form of the announcement is not vitally important. But there are some preliminary statements which fall short of acceptable standards.

One statement which this column saw recently began the company's preliminary announcement of profit figures with 'Balance brought forward from previous year' which is hardly the most telling of figures for the top of the column. From that figure there was subtracted corporation tax and to the residual of the two figures there was added the net profits of the year.

This is precisely the kind of exceptional presentation of figures that leads to mistranslation of the figures in the Press. Pre-tax profits, tax and net profit are the first three sets of figures in the majority of preliminary statements and this is gradually becoming the accepted form.

To come up against balance brought forward, a subtraction of corporation tax and an addition of net profit to provide a disposal amount is rather an unnerving business. It has to be admitted that the vast bulk of preliminary statements are now adequately presented, even though the style differs. But it is still relatively easy to spot 'sore thumbs' and one wonders in what kind of isolation the boards of such companies live, that they should allow their figures to be presented in such odd ways.

CITY NOTES

BUDGET DAY fixed for April 15th and sterling virtually back to the 2·39 mark against the dollar were coincidental items of news for the City and the stock-market. The second was more important than the first.

It was simple enough to forecast Budget Day as April 15th, Easter falling where it does this year. But it was, and at the time of writing is, not simple at all to translate the effect of the sidedrift from French franc doubts on sterling, nor the effect of possible franc devaluation.

As a result, what appeared to be an apparently promising and not entirely technical rally in the stock-market became very much an 'if' proposition. If the French franc were to be devalued heavily and if sterling could not stand the strain and had to be adjusted as well, would it be correct to assume that the Government would make the post-1967 devaluation mistakes all over again?

If not, would Bank rate immediately go still higher and would the tourniquet on credit be turned still tighter? In market terms that would mean either buying equities because of another strong bout of inflation or selling them on fear of a credit squeeze to beat all credit squeezes.

Unanswerable questions of that kind usually lead to stagnation in the stock-market – in the London stock-market at any rate. For fear of moving the wrong way operators make no move at all.

* * * *

NEW currency doubts and possible crises apart, there is currently still considerable City debate on just how high interest rates, as distinct from Bank rate, will go. Bank rate of itself is not necessarily a deterrent to borrowing. It may have marginal but no major effect on borrowing, provided the borrowing facility is there. If the supply is artificially cramped and demand is maintained then demand itself may force interest rates still higher and the same prime rate/market rate gap that the authorities tried partially to close by lifting Bank rate from 7 to 8 per cent may be opened up again. There are sure signs that it is beginning to be opened up already. Currently the industrial debenture borrowing rate is 9 per cent. It may be in double figures before much longer if any corporation is bold or needy enough to test the market.

* * * *

AT long last a building society has been independent enough to inject something new into building society investment procedure. Bristol & West Building Society has linked with the Vehicle & General Insurance group in offering contractual investment linked with life insurance and thereby 'allowable' for income tax purposes. The result is a certain capital build-up plus some worth-while life insurance. This, the first move by any building society to break from traditional building society investment offerings, stood to be derided by the building society establishment but also stands, in due course, to be copied.

* * * *

WHEN Slater Walker can attract well over £10 million of new investment money with one new unit trust offer, and while the unit trust movement still counts on getting somewhere near repeating last year's fund-gathering performance, the savings accent obviously has something more than an equity slant. It is even questionable whether tax allowances on contractual savings will be enough to attract savings on a fixed interest, arithmetical-safety basis. Capital protection is much more of an attraction than a probably minimal tax concession. The Government may possibly introduce some savings concessions nearer General Election time but any concessions will probably be on the mean side and to an extent self-cancelling like the so-called £50 freedom from long-term gains tax.

Valuation of Assets

SIR, – There is continual discussion as to the method of valuing assets in the balance sheet. Certain members of the profession prefer a cost basis, other prefer to revalue on a basis of adjusted cost, replacement cost or market price. Some prefer a basis that evolves from some concept of discounting anticipated revenue, while others seem to be of the opinion that the whole argument is both fruitless and irrelevant.

However, one might expect, if not agreement, a certain degree of common-sense and/or consistency. It is suggested that the accounts of the Imperial Tobacco Company show neither. This is because the directors have decided, with the approval of the auditors, to show investments at middle-market price rather than at cost. There are two questions that need to be asked: Why should investments that are essentially trade investments, in so far as they consist almost entirely of investments in British American Tobacco, be valued on the basis of a Stock Exchange price – that is, on a basis that depends ultimately on the opinion of the investing public? And secondly, why should one particular asset of the company be singled out for revaluation and then on a basis that would give possibly the highest value, when other fixed assets are still valued at cost?

There is never any attempt in the profession to justify valuation of assets at selling price. It has always been suggested that this is quite irrelevant unless, with current assets, the selling price is lower than the book value. In this instance the revaluation involves increasing the figure for investments from cost or valuation of £33 million to a figure of £276 million. It might be remarked that middle-market price is, where the number of shares involved is considerable, not even a fair selling price. This because middle-market price is higher than the Stock Exchange selling price, and in any event the unloading of these shares would inevitably depress the price.

Lest it be thought that mountains are being made out of molehills, it should be remarked that the total net assets of £554 million include an investment revaluation reserve of £202 million. That is to say, the revaluation of investments has apparently increased total net assets, or total funds employed, by almost 70 per cent. This is surely a very material figure.

Whilst it is reasonable that shareholders should be aware of the true figure of funds invested outside the company, though apparently not the true proportion, it is surely misleading to give the information in this way. If it is considered that investments are being properly valued, then why are they not included in total net assets when giving a figure for return on capital over ten years? Is this because, were they included, the return would read: 11·5, 10·6 and 10·5 per cent for 1966, 1967 and 1968, and not, as in the accounts, 14·5, 15·5 and 17·1 per cent?

An additional point of interest is the increase in the revaluation reserve in 1968 alone of £88·8 million, (over 50 per cent) which caused the return on capital just suggested to fall from 12·5 per cent to 10·5 per cent. It would be interesting to speculate on the affect on this return of a revaluation of fixed assets generally, that is, the principal trading assets of the group, now valued at cost.

Finally, if the auditors are of the opinion that it is necessary to revalue trade investments in order to show a true and fair view, why do they not take a similar position with reference to the accounts of the Daily Mail Group and the International Printing Corporation where the amounts are also material?

Yours faithfully,

Barry, Glamorgan. MICHAEL GREENER.

Sprinkler Systems and Insurance

SIR, – In his letter in the March 1st issue, Mr K. H. Matthews outlined some objections to the example regarding the installation of sprinkler systems given in my article 'Fire insurance premiums' published in the issue of February 15th.

The example was in fact compiled from figures quoted by the British Insurance Association who have now had an opportunity to examine Mr Matthews' criticisms. The following comments incorporate the Association's views on the points put forward by your correspondent.

It is not accepted that the payback period criterion for investment appraisal is long discredited. The criterion is widely used in industry today although it is gradually being superseded by the discounted cash flow (DCF) criterion. Certainly DCF is a more scientific method of investment appraisal but its weakness is that in order to make the necessary calculations many more assumptions have to be made about the future than are made for the payback period criterion. The more assumptions that have to be made, the greater the chance of faulty decisions arising.

There is no reason why the cost savings (being the reduction in the premium by £1,992) should not be quoted gross of tax. The article contains a warning that the premium is allowed as a deduction in computing a company's profits and its liability to corporation tax can be increased by 42½ per cent of any premium reduction. Obviously the article seeks to emphasize the savings and to show that cost savings net of tax would diminish the impact.

The adding of gross cost savings to the cost benefit of capital allowances is objected to presumably on the grounds that gross cost savings ignore the taxation aspect whereas the cash benefit of capital allowances takes that aspect, into account. Again the article seeks to make the maximum impact regarding the benefits flowing from the installation of a sprinkler system and, provided the make-up of the items added together is accurately described, one would have thought that this was acceptable. Any reader wishing to take the taxation aspect into account on all cost savings could easily recalculate the example from the information supplied, there is no attempt to mislead.

Capital allowances in the article are calculated on a straight-line basis in order easily to quantify the annual cash benefit of capital allowances. If capital allowances were calculated on a reducing-balance basis, the cash benefit would vary from year to year and would make the example unduly complicated. It is accepted that most taxpayers calculate capital allowances on a reducing balance basis partly for the sake of simplicity and partly on the grounds that capital allowances are greater in the earlier years and it is preferable to take taxation relief as early as possible. However it is not true to say that nobody ever adopts the straight-line basis. Some taxpayers are penalized by extra taxation if their taxable profits fluctuate. Use of a straight-line basis for capital allowances assists in averaging taxable profits.

Although not disputing the workings of Mr Matthews' example, it should be pointed out that the whole exercise depends on the investment cut-off rate selected. Mr Matthews has selected 15 per cent after tax and states that it 'is hardly excessive at present'. The investment cut-off rate is surely the rate of interest a company would have to pay for finance to purchase the sprinkler plus a loading to cover the risk element. In the case of a sprinkler there is very little risk element present. With a Bank rate at 8 per cent, overdraft facilities cost 9 to 10 per cent; after tax this amounts to 5 to 5¾ per cent. A loading of a further 10 per cent is excessive. If an investment cut-off rate of, say, 7 per cent after tax had been used, an example worked on Mr Matthews' lines would break-even in considerably less than ten years, probably nearer to the four years quoted in the original example.

Yours faithfully,

YOUR INSURANCE CORRESPONDENT.

Project Assessment

Manchester Chartered Accountants' Week-end Course

TAKING the plunge with some of the surplus finance from 1968's successful ventures, the committee of the Manchester Society of Chartered Accountants recently purchased an educational package on project assessment consisting of colour films, programmed tests of the type used frequently in schools and a detailed project case study. Subjects covered by the package include discounted cash flow, investment incentives and taxation, the cost of capital, how to deal with uncertainty, risk analysis and replacing equipment.

The first course to make use of the material was held recently at Manchester College of Commerce and – over a period of two days – members gained a fresh insight into the problems of deciding on the most suitable course of action from the unlimited number of alternatives open to management when assessing new projects.

Those taking part were immediately introduced to the problems facing managers in industry and it was soon realized that project assessment is a team job necessitating the ability to assess and co-ordinate the opinions of market, production, research and financial advisers.

Effects of taxation and grants

At a first session with the project case study members were faced with the bewildering array of alternatives through which they were to feel their way as the course developed. Breaking into syndicates, the first and second programmed learning books showed them that even £ notes do not keep their value through time and they progressed rapidly from simple to compound interest and the theory and practice of discounted cash flow.

This session was followed by consideration of the effects of taxation and grants on the alternative proposals for expansion and an introduction to marketing problems. At each session the chairman and secretaries of the syndicates led and summarized the findings of their teams and the data accumulated steadily as the teams worked through the books and case study. All the papers and the first film were linked to the case study so that knowledge was progressively built up step by step. The second film summarized the teaching up to the end of Book II.

The evening session required a supply of liquid refreshment as the course settled down to Book III, with each member muttering about selling, or not selling? Blick process or Romchem process? What size of plant? Where shall we site it?

Pressure increased the following day. To the problems of choosing the 'most favoured state of the world' set of alternatives were added myriads more as the syndicates considered Book IV which showed them the effects of taking into account other selections from market and plant sizes and changing the dates of erection and start-up. They begin to realize what sensitivity analysis meant when it was found that the 720 computer solutions provided did not contain two of the most popular ones and 'volunteers' were set to work on DCF tables and tax calculations.

Mysteries of risk analysis

The syndicates then completed their formal 'Expenditure Proposals' to their company chairman and later presented their (differing) recommendations at a formal session They were relieved to find in the final film that experienced managers of Esso, Unilever, British Visqueen and ICI also had differing opinions. By this time full realization had sunk in that there is no one answer to any project and that the first job is to list all options with no constraints on thinking.

After the film the teams found themselves working on even more alternatives as they were taught the mysteries of risk analysis which takes into account the probabilities that actual events will differ from the plans. (Who has been lucky enough to have projects which did work out according to plan?)

On the final (Sunday) morning the teams were joined by the Manchester Society's President, Mr D. A. Boothman, F.C.A., and there was an interesting discussion with the two tutors, Mr J. Townsley, B.COM., A.C.A., and Mr T. E. Heywood, F.C.A., of the Society's special projects subcommittee which had organized the course, and Mr F. A. Bailey, F.C.A., and Mr F. Walsh, A.C.A., A.C.I.S., A.C.W.A. Messrs Bailey and Townsley represented the teaching and research function, and Messrs Walsh and Heywood the applications function. Many practical points and examples were discussed.

Mr D. A. Boothman, F.C.A., President of the Manchester Society of Chartered Accountants, makes a point, vigorously, to an interested group of course members.

'Good value for money'

The package was made by SB Modules with the help of Methuen Education Ltd and Granville TV Studios for ICI Ltd. It is based on current management training experience. The Education Committee propose to make the package available to full-time accountancy students at the college as it is suitable for any level of experience.

Valuable feed-back was obtained from the syndicate members for use on later courses but the general opinion was 'very good value for money – we are saturated with alternatives'. There was one final good word of advice to those proposing to attend future courses – 'swot up on the booklets before the course starts or you are in for a hard week-end!'

Annual Report and Accounts for 1968

The annual report of the Council and the accounts of the Institute for the year 1968 were approved for issue to members of the Institute.

Replies to Press Advertisements

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

(i) It is well established that members should not advertise for professional work. Inquiries have been received as to whether members may reply to advertisements offering such work.

(ii) The Council wishes to advise members that there is no reason why they should not reply to advertisements for professional services. If, however, an advertisement is clearly designed to attract full-time staff, a practising member who replied and offered professional services, other than on a full-time salaried basis, could render himself liable to disciplinary action.

Companies Legislation in the 1970s

The Council approved a memorandum, Companies Legislation in the 1970s, for submission to the President of the Board of Trade on behalf of the bodies represented on the Accountants Joint Parliamentary Committee, namely, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, and for publication thereafter.

Sale of Members' Handbook

The Council approved the sale of the Members' Handbook to the general public for £12 per copy, including the issue of all supplements up to December 31st, 1970, but agreed that prospective purchasers should be warned that a revised format for Part II of the Members' Handbook was likely to be introduced before the end of 1970.

Booklets – reference to names of firms

The Council granted permission, as provided for in paragraph 5 of Section E3 of the Members' Handbook, for references to be made to the names of two firms in management information booklets which they had been asked by the National Economic Development Office (NEDO) to produce.

Appointment of Institute Representatives

It was reported that Mr E. C. Meade, F.C.A., had been nominated to represent the Institute on a committee set up by the Statute Law Society 'to examine the ways in which the official system of framing, enacting and publishing Statute Laws in the United Kingdom failed to meet the requirements of the user'.

University and CNAA Degree Courses

Exemption from the Intermediate Examination

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

The Council has approved the following university degree courses under bye-law 68 and CNAA degree courses under bye-law 88 (c). These courses are therefore recognized not only for reduction in service under articles to three years but also for exemption from the Intermediate examination of the Institute.

University Degrees

Glasgow – Bachelor of Accountancy
University College, Cork – Bachelor of Commerce
Queen's University, Belfast – Bachelor of Science in Economics

CNAA Degrees in Business Studies

Dundee College of Technology
Wolverhampton College of Technology
Woolwich Polytechnic.

Degree courses approved by the Council are, in some cases, a selected part of a larger course and precise details may be obtained from the Institute on request.

Exemption from the Intermediate Examination – Referral

Bye-laws 88 (a) and 88 (c)

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

The Council has decided to accept a single subject referral at the final examination of university and CNAA degree courses approved by the Council and at college examinations following a nine months full-time course for exemption from the Intermediate examination of the Institute.

At present exemption from the Intermediate examination of the Institute is normally granted to an articled clerk who passes, at the first attempt, the final degree examination of a university of CNAA degree course approved by the Council. Only in exceptional circumstances is such exemption granted where an articled clerk has been required to sit the examination again in part or in whole. This also applies to the college examination which follows the completion of a nine months full-time course.

The effect of acceptance of a single subject referral is that in future exemption will normally be granted:

(a) Under bye-law 88 (a)

'To an articled clerk who has followed a university degree course approved under the provisions of bye-law 68 and who passes the final degree examination at the first attempt, or who passes that examination after being successful in one, and only one, referred subject.

(b) Under bye-law 88 (c)

'To an articled clerk who has:

(i) followed a CNAA degree course approved under the provisions of bye-law 88 (c) and who passes the final degree examination at the first attempt, or who passes that examination after being successful in one, and only one, referred subject;

(ii) followed a nine months' full-time course approved under bye-law 88 (c) and who passes the college examination at the first attempt, or who passes that examination after being successful in one, and only one, referred subject.

An articled clerk who fails the final degree or college examination at the first attempt or who fails in the referred subject will not, other than in exceptional circumstances, be granted exemption from the Intermediate examination of the Institute if he subsequently passes the relevant examination.

These changes operate for examinations taken in the 1968–69 session.

CARBS* adopts Save and Prosper Personal Pension Plan

The outstanding advantage of the Save and Prosper Personal Pension Plan is that it is a means of regular saving in which—under Section 22 of the Finance Act—the whole of the instalments, whether paid monthly, yearly or in lump sums at intervals, is exempt from income tax and surtax. What is more, the pension is treated for tax purposes as earned income.

Under the CARBS scheme, 98% of all contributions are invested in the Save and Prosper unit trust of your choice. This gives your pension the protection from inflation—and the chance of real growth in value terms—that well-managed unit trust investments offer. These advantages apply to your pension even after retirement.

The Plan also allows you to make provision for your wife or other dependants.

Have you considered the Bahamas, seriously? We have. We are a public company quoted on the American Stock Exchange.

Our rating is 'triple A', – there is no higher. Our assets are multi-million.

Our holdings in allied companies of international standing are of significant proportions.

We are dedicated to resort development 'par excellence'. We do not care to waste time – yours or ours. Modestly, we submit, we mean business!

Currently we are developing by far the finest resort within the Bahamas/Florida area. It is aptly named PARADISE ISLAND. Located:

Five jet hours from London
Two from New York
Thirty-five minutes from Miami: and
A few hundred yards from the heart of Nassau

Can you think of a finer location?

It is carefully and spaciously planned, wisely zoned, compact and appealing; in fact we think it is perfect.

Tuned-in to the needs of the American and International markets we never cease to be amazed by the surplus of capital so readily available for recreation and pleasure.

Participating with us are such significant names as Holiday Inns International, Loew's Hotels Inc., Flagler Systems Inc., Café Martinique of Paris (used as an exotic setting by James Bond in 'Thunderball'). Belgian Construction Syndicates and Swiss Consortiums have arrived.

Amongst the wealth, the magnificence, the dynamism and the natural splendour of the bougainvillea and the casuarina pines, there is but the tiniest sprinkling of 'hearts-of-oak' – which makes us wonder 'Britain where art thou?' The grit, the temperament, the dogged determined spirit – we want you – to develop, to think, to grow – so rapidly – with us.

The smallest venture in this resort (we own other developments where prices are lower) will involve a land and construction cost of a cool half-million (£). If we like the cut of your jib it is possible a sizeable mortgage can be arranged. The return? Less than £80,000 per annum would surprise us, if you want income, or a capital appreciation of 50% realisable on a highly saleable asset within a twelvemonth. By retaining ownership for five years income and appreciation should realise for you no less than £1,750,000. The return can be in dollars, and, of course, tax free!

Do you want to develop a shopping centre, or a hotel, blocks of flats or very superior individual residences? There is little we cannot offer to the interested developer with guts, go and – of course – finance.

Whenever you look at your watch do bear us in mind; for time is running out – for you – the tax man (and the budget) cometh!

We did mention, we do not care to waste time; you can join us now without the payment of a levy, a premium or any restriction. As a gesture of welcome we are prepared to arrange inspection visits for six-day periods. When might we expect you in this delightful Paradise?

FINDING AND DECISION OF THE DISCIPLINARY COMMITTEE

Finding and Decision of the Disciplinary Committee of the Council of the Institute at a hearing held on 8th January, 1969

A formal complaint was preferred by the Investigation Committee of the Council of the Institute to the Disciplinary Committee of the Council:

That a fellow of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has been guilty of acts or defaults discreditable to a member of the Institute within the meaning of Clause 21 sub-clause (3) of the supplemental Royal Charter in that he failed (a) within a reasonable time despite verbal undertakings to do so to reply in writing to or report that he had taken any action in response to letters addressed to him by Assistant Secretaries of the Institute dated 7th December 1967, 8th January 1968 and 30th January 1968 respectively (b) to reply in writing to or report that he had taken any action in response to three letters addressed to him by Assistant Secretaries of the Institute dated 19th July 1968, 6th August 1968 and 5th September 1968 respectively

So as to render himself liable to be excluded or suspended from membership of the Institute or to be reprimanded or admonished.

Finding

The Committee found that the formal complaint had been proved under both headings.

Decision

The Committee ordered that the member be admonished but considered that there existed special circumstances justifying the omission of his name from the publication of the Finding and Decision.

Institute's President Speaks on Challenge Facing the Profession

THE challenge facing the accountancy profession was emphasized by Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, at the annual dinner of the Sheffield and District Society of Chartered Accountants, held in the Cutlers' Hall on Friday of last week. Mr Dixon, who was replying to the toast of the Institute, said it was in the light of that challenge that they had been working for three years on the plan for the reorganization of the profession.

That plan would be put before members very shortly. The accountant today had to learn much, and had to be either a general practitioner or a specialist.

The profession faced a tremendous challenge from other bodies and other disciplines, such as the products of the management colleges and schools, mathematicians, economists and so on, and if the profession was to retain the place he believed it had, it had to adapt its training.

They had to specialize and acquire the new disciplines, and he believed the best place to acquire those management disciplines was by training in industry itself.

It would be suicidal, said Mr Dixon, if they were to attempt to meet the great challenge they faced as a divided profession.

Therefore, the scheme being put before members provided for the integration of the various bodies of the accountancy profession.

It was, he said, folly for different bodies to strive in competition to attract the all-too-few suitable candidates.

They had it from education authorities and universities that if the accountancy profession wanted to attract the best of the graduates and the best of those trained in the other disciplines they should do so as a united profession.

Two professions or one?

The issue was simply: Did they believe there should be two professions – one engaging in the narrow field of the practitioner (auditing and taxation) and the other engaged in the field of management information.

Or did they believe that the challenge facing the profession today could best be met by one united profession – each one making his own particular contribution for the good of the whole.

Earlier, proposing the toast of the Institute, Dr H. M. Finniston, deputy chairman of the British Steel Corporation, said 'we are becoming a race of professionals, each taking up a particular discipline we continue to nurture throughout our careers'.

But what had impressed him over the past ten years was that professionals had got to turn to a much wider field of expertise.

Collaboration

This was very difficult for both scientists and accountants, but one could not live in isolation. An accountant who was in isolation was not an accountant at all. The accountant had to learn the jargon of the technical man just as much as vice versa.

Scientists had learned this lesson – for example, only recently they started a course at the Imperial College which was teaching the elements of accountancy to scientists.

Accountants, he suggested, should concern themselves with the role non-accountants were playing.

He said the BSC were looking to the accountant to help seek some of the answers to the problems of where to allocate their resources.

Something of the order of £1,100 million was to be spent by BSC in the course of the next six years, and where and how it was spent was of great moment to the nation as a whole.

Referring to the private and nationalized sectors of the steel industry, he said they would have to come to some modus vivendi if they were to reach success.

The accountant in order to deal with certain difficult problems needed to be much more sophisticated in his techniques. The accountant was the man who had to look at these problems and come to some decision as to what it was best to do. But he was not going to come to a good decision if he took a narrow view about what planning was about.

Mr M. Sheppard, F.C.A., J.P., President of the Sheffield Society, proposing 'The Guests', said the BSC played a very important part directly and indirectly in the economic life of the district.

Many who were engaged in the management of companies producing alloy steels and special steels were wondering whether or not the BSC had taken unfair advantage of the private sector by severely limiting increases, or, in some cases, reducing the prices of those steels and processing margins wherever the private sector produced a substantial percentage.

At the same time, the Corporation had proposed an increase of no less than 7·3 per cent in the price of bulk steels. It was hoped the Prices and Incomes Board would do something to rectify that matter.

Mr Eric W. Taylor, general manager, Sheffield Wednesday Football Club, replied to the toast.

How Students Should Present Their Case

Council Member's Views at Manchester Students' Dinner

ARTICLED clerks should choose 'Parliamentary language' when dealing with the Institute and they would be surprised how their views got through, said Mr D. N. Walton, F.C.A., a member of the Council of the Institute, speaking at the annual dinner of The Manchester Chartered Accountants' Students' Society on Thursday of last week.

Mr Walton, who was responding to the toast of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and the Guests, went on to say that it was when students 'slammed' the Institute too hard before even putting their case that matters became difficult for progress to be made.

He recalled his own student days when the Institute formally appointed a correspondence college as its sponsored tutor. There was disagreement about it at the time in Manchester and it fell upon him to tell his father (who was Vice-President of the Institute from 1938 to 1942 and to whom he was articled) in 'Parliamentary language' just what the students thought of the decision.

Touching upon 'future plans' Mr Walton said that education was an important subject whatever the outcome. There were 4,000 articled clerks every year, 2,600 of whom were three- and four-year articled clerks. Nearly 1,000 of these were already attending nine months' full-time courses on a voluntary basis. That, he declared, had been achieved by the education committee within the last three or four years. This astonished him, as it started only in 1966 with four colleges.

The figure had built up annually to 8, 12 and 20 colleges. If anyone had told him a few years ago that up to 1,000 of their articled clerks would be receiving some theoretical education before they went to their offices, he would never have believed it.

Producing a saleable product

He referred to the pressure on the time of principals, caused by changing accounting methods, electronic data processing and the 'terrific volume of legislation'. Nonetheless, it was necessary, said Mr Walton, for principals to give training in the standards, procedures and working methods of the firm. He stressed that principals had 'to produce a saleable product'.

Proposing the toast, Mr A. V. J. Moore, F.C.A., President of the Society, said that the future of the Institute was being hotly debated at the moment, and he knew that students were vitally interested. So far as he could tell, their interest lay mainly in how it would affect their training. Training was, of course, important, but he urged his audience not to overstress the question of what other people could, or should, do for them.

Formal instruction was vital, and they must have it, but original thought and application could not be taught and they must do that themselves. Mr Moore said that he would like to pass on two rules which had been given to him and which he found useful.

The first was: 'Keep it simple'. Any fool could make a statement or a report complicated, but there was an art in making things simple and easy to understand. The second was: 'If you never do more than you are paid for, you will never be paid for more than you do'.

He said that students had a reputation nowadays for finding rules and regulations irksome, but there had to be rules. He said that it was the constant task of students to challenge the validity of those rules.

The toast of the Society was proposed in humorous vein by Judge J. Zigmond, who said that he, himself, had sought assistance on money matters from accountants. He did not know what accountants did when they themselves needed financial advice, but he supposed that they advised themselves. He hoped that they were more fortunate than he had been. He had never had any success – he still paid taxes.

Responding, Mr C. E. Cartwright, a member of the Society's committee, paid tribute to the ability of judges to put aside their personal prejudices and listen only to the evidence before them.

Students Meet Council Members

THE annual meeting between members of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and the National Executive Committee of the Association of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies took place in London in the offices of the Institute on Thursday of last week. At a meeting of the Executive Committee earlier in the day it was announced that the second annual Business Game for student societies would be held in London next October. Tony Williams, who is organizing a charter flight to the USA for members of the Association, reported that the response from students had been good and that the itinerary of the trip would cover North-east America.

GRANTS FOR COMPANIES MOVING TO DEVELOPMENT AREAS

Last week the Board of Trade announced a change in the basis of operating the grants offered under Section 4 of the Local Employment Act 1960 towards initial expenses of firms setting up and providing employment in the Development Areas.

In order to simplify and clarify the arrangements for these grants it has been decided that in future they will be assessed on the basis of costs of moving within the United Kingdom to a Development Area. Such costs comprise the removal of plant and machinery, including dismantling and reinstallation; the removal of necessary stock, including raw materials, partly completed and finished goods, spare parts, loose tools, etc.; travel and accommodation during preliminary visits to the new area by the management; and termination of employment payments.

These grants are subject to recommendation by the Board of Trade Advisory Committee, who need to be satisfied that there are good prospects of the project being successful. Where grants are recommended by the Committee these will be a substantial contribution towards what the Committee consider to be reasonable costs. The total amount of grant offered may also depend on the amount of employment to be provided.

A COMMENTARY UPON

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

on a

1968 FINANCE ACT EDITION

This recording aims at clarifying this tax, also to list exemptions and avoid pitfalls where possible. Guidance is given in an easily understandable manner.

Certain points often raised are:

(1) How much would I have to pay on a gain if I sold some shares now? For many people the rate could be less than 30 per cent, which is a rate often quoted for an individual.

(2) What is the position if I dispose of my house? Even though part of it has been used for a business!

(3) I am considering retiring from the business and disposing of certain assets or shareholdings. To what extent does retirement exemption affect this situation?

(4) There is an exemption upon death, how does this affect father's estate?

(5) My company is selling certain of its assets and hopes to repurchase items of a similar kind. The old assets will show a very considerable gain, what relief is there in these circumstances?

(6) I have some shares upon which a 'rights issue' has been made, how am I affected by capital gains tax provisions?

(7) How are disposals of leases affected?

(8) Can I give my son a capital sum of money without attracting this tax?

(9) How is capital gains tax affected by betterment levy?

(10) Upon maturity are the proceeds of my life endowment subject to capital gains tax?

The above questions are only a few of the many that are being asked frequently. The recording will give answers to these questions, and many other points of doubt will be clarified.

Also available is a fully comprehensive commentary upon the

1967 COMPANIES ACT

(available on LP Record or on Tape 3¾ ips. 5 in. spool)

This recording is aimed at busy people who require a thorough knowledge of this new Companies Act. In forty-five minutes' playing time the Act is explained as simply as is possible. All persons having contact with a company will obtain considerable benefit through this medium with a minimum loss of time to themselves. The Act became fully operative this year and many new obligations were placed upon officers of a company and their advisers. Guidance is stated in a very easily understandable manner.

These recordings are scripted by chartered accountants for the benefit of the profession, industry and commerce, and read by Richard Maddock, of B.B.C.

Future Plans

THIS week members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales will have received notices summoning them to a special meeting at the Albert Hall on April 17th to consider the resolutions necessary to empower the Council to take the next step towards full implementation of the 'Scheme for the Development of the Accountancy Profession in Great Britain and Ireland'. Meetings of the other five participating bodies are to be held for similar purposes shortly afterwards. This choice of dates is hardly coincidental: the English Institute is by far the largest of the bodies affected and its members should be aware that their vote will directly influence the scheme as a whole.

Since publication of the scheme (noted in our columns of July 27th last), representatives of the Council of the Institute have attended a total of 65 meetings to discuss the proposals with members and to obtain their views. We reproduce on other pages the main points raised by the seven thousand members who attended those meetings, together with the Council's replies. Whatever may be the final outcome of the proposals now before the profession, we feel with Macaulay that 'e'en the ranks of Tuscany could scarce forbear to cheer' this notable piece of work voluntarily undertaken for posterity.

It comes as no surprise to learn of the universal dislike for the title of 'Licentiate Accountant', and this is one feature at which the Council has undertaken to look again. The modern proliferation of professional and quasi-professional bodies whose interests are as diverse as their standards makes the selection of alternative initials a task of no little difficulty. While the suggested alternative of 'AAM' (Affiliated Accountant Member) has a quite different significance to one generation, it can hardly fail to be more euphonious than 'Lic.A.'.

The activity of our own correspondence columns is a sufficient testimony to the lively interest aroused by the scheme within the profession. In his covering letter to members of the Institute, the President, Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., underlines an opinion which we expressed last July; he says: 'Do please read all the papers most carefully, weigh the advantages of the scheme as a whole against any individual feature you may dislike, and exercise your right to vote either by attending the special meeting in person or by appointing a proxy'. To this can only be added 'Amen'. We have already witnessed the painful consequences of apathy in Institute affairs and the issues now at stake far transcend in importance anything that occurred last summer.

The Work of the Scottish Institute

ON receiving the financial accounts of the company in which he is a shareholder, the investor immediately looks to see how much profit has been made and what his dividend is likely to be. If he is also a member of a professional body, his corresponding concern on first looking at its accounts is whether a deficit has been avoided and if not, by how much his annual subscription is likely to be increased. The two approaches, positive and negative, are not incompatible because the commercial undertaking is primarily out to make money, whereas the professional body is in existence to give service.

In its accounts for 1968, circulated last week, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland has contrived by good housekeeping to make a modest surplus of £4,696 on a gross income of £204,281. This has been achieved by absorbing higher costs by higher income. Every effort, the Council reports, is being made to contain rising costs in the present year but, looking further ahead, it will be necessary to ask members at the forthcoming annual general meeting on March 28th to approve an increase in subscription rates as from January 1st, 1970, in order 'to limit the probable deficit for that year'.

In the accompanying report of the Council, extracts from which are reproduced elsewhere in this issue, the membership of the Institute at the end of 1968 is shown as 8,314, a net increase over the year of 290 – an unusually large intake which contributed to the higher income referred to above. On the other hand, the number of apprentices 'on the stocks' at the turn of the year was only 1,807 as compared with 1,937 at the end of 1967. The Council notes with satisfaction that more graduates are being attracted to the profession. The effect of this welcome trend is reflected in the examination results which continue to do credit both to the candidates and to the domestic tutorial policy of the Institute.

It is now generally realized that education in the profession does not end with qualification and in 1968 there has been, as the Council states, a very considerable expansion both in the number and variety of courses provided and in the numbers of members attending. Ten residential courses and 40 non-residential courses were held, involving in all 98 course days and 1,662 participants. A wide range of subjects was covered and the programme for 1969 is equally ambitious. Some of the courses successfully mounted in Scotland are being presented this year in London and other English 'outposts'.

The Institute's publications continue to attract a wide readership. The latest of these, a 224-page book entitled Direct Taxation in the United Kingdom, and derived from material prepared for a taxation course held in June 1968, appeared last December and may rival the popularity of The Companies Act 1967, which was issued in August 1967 and has to date sold over 18,000 copies. The new publication is intended to help tax specialists, practising accountants and students, the general principles outlined being illustrated with actual examples of common tax problems.

In his foreword to the Council's report, the President stresses the continuing need for participation by the Institute in the wider counsels of the profession. Immediately on its doorstep are the far-reaching proposals to rationalize the profession in the British Isles. The President himself set a good example in communications by conducting meetings of members in Canada and Bermuda, besides the 15 'local' meetings held in various centres in Great Britain between September and November, to discuss the 'future plans' scheme. The special general meeting to submit the integration proposals for approval in principle will take place in Glasgow on April 25th.

The Institute will be well represented at the sixth congress of the Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers at Copenhagen in October, as both the UEC President and the author of a paper at one of the technical sessions are Scottish chartered accountants. A third member of the Institute is the British representative of the editorial board of the Journal UEC.

There is ample evidence in the Council's report that in other directions, also, the Institute is contributing in fair measure to furthering the aims and ideals of the profession on an international basis and that the importance of its efforts is being realized and appreciated.

In Europe, the President points out, there is a high regard for the Institute and such esteem, certainly worthily earned, must not be lightly lost. In a constantly changing world, the perennial problem facing the members is to maintain the essentially Scottish character of the Institute while at the same time evolving an international outlook. It would appear from its 1968 report that the Council is skilfully steering the ship in the right direction.

Tax Simplification

NO reader of this journal could have been surprised by the revelation of the state of affairs inside the Inland Revenue offices disclosed by senior officials to the Estimates Committee during the recent sittings (The Accountant, March 15th). Opinions may differ as to the best solution. It is understandable that the Revenue spokesmen should stress the need for additional and well-trained staff; it is equally understandable that the Accountants Joint Parliamentary Committee should emphasize the need for basic reform in the tax system. Indeed, it is surely self-evident that while the Revenue's remedy may merely make the present log-jam less intractible, the proposals which have been put forward by the accountancy profession go to the very heart of the problem.

Nothing that has so far been said, much less done, on the official side can make any improvement. The Revenue staff face a 'long, hard haul' but even if that is successfully achieved, no lasting relief can be expected. Already there is talk of further additions to the tax structure – a gifts tax, for example. Such a proposal may help the morale of Government back-benchers but it could be the last straw for the Revenue and tax practitioners.

It is not so much the introduction of new taxes that is criticized, although when they are ill-conceived and still less well-prepared for the statute book, the practitioner may justly complain. The real complaint is that successive Chancellors pile Ossa on Pelion; always additions with nothing scrapped.

In a new letter to the Chancellor, here reproduced, the Accountants Joint Parliamentary Committee make a final pre-Budget attempt to secure the setting up of a Select Committee to overhaul the whole fiscal structure with a view to the rationalization of the tax system and making administration simpler, more efficient and more economic. The proposals do not offer immediate relief or improvement. They do, however, offer a rational approach to resolving a complex situation. No one with any understanding of the complexities, political and economic as well as legal and administrative, believes the situation can be resolved overnight. But the sooner a start is made, the better.

Dear Chancellor,

PARLIAMENT AND FISCAL ADMINISTRATION

A year ago my predecessor in office drew your attention to the confused condition of our fiscal system and the need for overhaul. In reply you said that you doubted that the proposals he made for a fundamental new approach to the administration of fiscal measures would advance matters and suggested instead that the best means of making progress would be for the allied accountancy bodies to put forward ideas for simplification in detail and thrash them out with the Board of Inland Revenue.

Although we were conscious that your reaction amounted to complete rejection of our plea for fundamental rethinking of the approach to fiscal administration, we have tried nevertheless to suggest to the Inland Revenue some ways to bring about some immediate improvement in the present unsatisfactory position. We knew however that doing so could produce no more than minor or marginal remissions, and these in one area only of the entire fiscal system.

Our extensive discussions with the Board of Inland Revenue have only served to confirm our original view that an independent body with wider powers than the Board possess is necessary to achieve proper rationalization. The fiscal system has been allowed to sink into an ill-assorted jumble which an increasing number of taxpayers misunderstand, find incomprehensible and despair of. It has remained operative because of the efforts, devotion and practical sense of its administrators, the adoption of extra-statutory adjustments and devices to overcome unreasonable or unworkable provisions, and the continuing tolerance and co-operation of taxpayers and their professional advisers. We do not think these can be relied on as inexhaustible resources.

We are driven to conclude that we have entirely failed to convince you of the significance and urgency of the problem. Year by year we have selectively documented and placed before the Inland Revenue a great number of examples of fiscal anomalies and practical difficulties. We have contended for – and have sometimes obtained – small reliefs and remedies. But we must repeat our view that there is an urgent need for re-examination of the whole fiscal structure by a process which permits the requirements of policy to be objectively measured against the administrative problems involved. The longer this process is delayed the greater the problem becomes since the existing procedure of introducing annual changes in the fiscal structure does not give room for proper forward planning and integration of new measures in a total fiscal and economic context. The process of patch and mend will no longer serve.

This is why we are dismayed by the present policy of pressing us to deal with minor repairs and why we must repeat our previous submissions that:

(1) The whole fiscal structure should be examined by a Select Committee of the House of Commons with a view to rationalization and making administration simpler, more efficient and more economic.

(2) There should be time for adequate discussion of new fiscal proposals before the traditional Parliamentary procedure begins.

(3) New fiscal proposals should first be examined by a Select Committee with power to call witnesses.

We can see no other effective and constitutional means of ensuring that the practical operation of our fiscal system is subjected to full, independent and authoritative appraisal, so as to ensure that it proves workable and comprehensible in action.

You will be aware that there is an increasing weight of opinion in favour of our views, which are shared by many others as well as accountants. We ask you once again to take action as a matter of urgency.

Yours sincerely,

S. DIXON, Chairman,
ACCOUNTANTS JOINT PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE.

Current Affairs

Institute's Future Plans Meeting

AS already well publicized, a special meeting of members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales is being held on April 17th in the Royal Albert Hall to consider the implementation of the scheme for the development of the accountancy profession in the British Isles.

Notices concerning the meeting have been sent out this week. They give the terms of three resolutions to be submitted – two by the Council, and one by Mr D. E. T. Tanfield, F.C.A. The latter was accepted for submission in order to avoid the possibility of another requisitioned meeting.

Proxy cards have also been sent out and are returnable not later than 2 p.m. on April 15th. Members who have lodged proxies will not, however, thereby be debarred from attending the meeting and voting in person if, in the event, they are able to be present. The resolutions, which can be passed by a simple majority, are as follows:

Resolution No. 1 (submitted by the Council)

THAT the scheme for the development of the accountancy profession in Great Britain and Ireland, which was issued to members on July 25th, 1968 (a print whereof has been produced to this meeting and for identification signed by the chairman hereof), be approved in principle and the Council be authorized to take such further steps as may seem to the Council to be necessary or desirable to enable formal proposals for the implementation of the scheme to be submitted, subject however:

A. to further consideration being given
   (a) to the description of and designatory letters for members holding the proposed junior qualification;
   (b) to the number and timing of examinations for chartered students;
   (c) to the maximum permissible period of secondment for chartered accountant students;

B. to changes being made so as:
   (a) to extend from three months to six months the probationary period of service under a training contract for a chartered accountant student;
   (b) to require any former member or student of The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants to adopt the description 'Certified Accountant' if he engages in practice to perform reserved functions unless either:
      (i) he has been engaged, whilst a member of that Association, in public practice as his main occupation at any time prior to July 1st, 1968; or
      (ii) he has first obtained thirty months 'appropriate experience' as defined in the scheme except that, as a transitional provision, such experience may be obtained overseas in the case of a member who will neither be in practice nor be a partner in a firm which is in practice in Great Britain or Ireland;

C. to similar approval and authority being obtained by the Councils of the other participating bodies, namely:
   The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland;
   The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland;
   The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants;
   The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants;
   The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants.

Resolution No. 2 (submitted by the Council)

THAT, subject to and conditionally upon Resolution No. 1 above being passed, the scheme there mentioned be extended, to include the admission of members of The Association of International Accountants, The British Association of Accountants and Auditors and the Faculty of Auditors on the basis of the entry criteria which were set out in an addendum to the scheme issued to members in the Institute Newsletter for September 1968 (a print whereof has been produced to this meeting and for identification signed by the chairman hereof).

Resolution No. 3 (submitted by Mr D. E. T. Tanfield, F.C.A.)

That this meeting rejects the proposal to extend membership to the members of:
   The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants;
   The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants;
   The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants;
   The Association of International Accountants;
   The British Association of Accountants and Auditors;
   The Faculty of Auditors;

but considers that many of the other proposals in 'A scheme for the development of the accountancy profession in Great Britain and Ireland' should be pursued by the Council.

Investment Grants and Import Deposits

THE Board of Trade has advised the allied accountancy bodies how it intends to regard the import deposits scheme for the purposes of investment grants.

By the terms of the scheme, importers are required to make an interest-free deposit with HM Customs and Excise of a sum of money equal to 50 per cent of the value of the imported goods. The deposit is returnable after a period of six months has elapsed and is repaid automatically on the appropriate date. As such, the Board of Trade says it is not a charge upon the importer and could not be added to the cost of the goods for the purpose of calculating investment grant.

Where, however, a person is importing goods for his own use, he might wish to add a notional amount in his books to represent the cost to himself of financing the import deposit over the six-month period. Practice in this respect will no doubt vary, the Board says. Nevertheless, in accordance with the Board of Trade policy of not admitting financing charges incurred by the user of an asset as being part of its cost for investment grant purposes, the Board will not admit interest charges, or loss of interest incurred in financing import deposits.

In view of the starting date of the import deposits scheme (November 27th, 1968), the point will not be a factor until the Board of Trade is called to consider claims for the fourth quarter of 1968.

Consumer Complaints on Professional Services

FEW members of the public would dissent from the opinion that standards of professional competence in Britain are high. Occasionally, however, clients feel dissatisfied with the service they receive and in such circumstances, states the Consumer Council in a submission to the Monopolies Commission on the Professions, 'when a consumer does have a complaint . . . he is likely to find difficulty in pursuing it'.

The Council reviews the procedures employed by the professional associations of solicitors, architects, pharmacists and accountants for reviewing complaints from clients and the attendant disciplinary procedures.

Commenting on the disciplinary procedure of the English Institute, it is observed that it is similar in form to that of the Law Society but its disciplinary machinery is purely domestic and non-statutory. However, comments the Consumer Council, 'the ICA office has a procedure for handling complaints which appears to be more flexible than in the case of some other professional societies. Each complainant is replied to individually and no standard letters are used. . . . In case of neglect of clients business, the ICA often helps informally by giving the member a prod in order to speed things up'. The Council concludes that protection against negligence by accountants has assumed considerable importance in recent years; claims have been increasing and consequently insurance premiums have risen quite sharply.

Of the Law Society the Council comments on the fact that the standard reply often sent to complainants advising the latter to consult another independent solicitor is neither particularly helpful nor calculated to console the recipient. Some of the shortcomings evident in the existing system, it is suggested, could be made good by establishing an advisory panel with a much wider remit than the present Law Society machinery, and such a panel should include lay members possibly on a 50 : 50 basis.

In connection with architects the Consumer Council takes the view that the statutory limitation period which deprives the client of a remedy should be extended, and that the provision should either require practitioners to maintain indemnity policies or create a central compensation fund.

Questions in Parliament

THE Minister of Housing and Local Government, Mr Anthony Greenwood, faces several questions on Tuesday, March 25th, from Conservative MPs intent on mitigating the effect of betterment levy.

Mr Reginald Eyre (Cons., Birmingham, Hall Green) wants to know how many widows have been served with demands for the levy and how many had signified they were unable to pay. Mr James Dance (Cons., Bromsgrove) wants amending legislation to provide that betterment levy is only charged when the land in question is sold and not when it changes hands in the form of a gift.

Mr Evelyn King (Cons., South Dorset) wants Mr Greenwood to seek power to prohibit the Land Commission from imposing the levy on an owner-occupier who has built a single dwelling.

Mr Harold Gurden (Cons., Birmingham, Selly Oak) wants exemption for those who did not foresee the levy and were unable to pay it. Mr William van Straubenzee (Cons., Wokingham) asks that development levy be waived when a property has been purchased compulsorily from a levy payer.

In another question down for answer at the same time, Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Cons., Kensington South) will ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the estimated administrative and manpower savings to be obtained by integrating income tax and social security savings.

Mr Frederick Silvester (Cons., Walthamstow, West) intends on the same day to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to reduce the composite rate of tax paid by building societies, in view of the fact that it is a hindrance to greater deposits.

Use of Company Car is Taxable

A SCHEME under which employees of a company could have the free use of a car and a correspondingly decreased wage has given rise to a remarkable degree of judicial disagreement on the income tax position of the employees. In the end, the House of Lords decided last week that the employee had to pay Schedule E tax on the use of the car (The Times, March 13th), thus reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal in Heaton v. Bell (47 ATC 171).

The scheme was optional. The company provided the car and paid the insurance and licence, a condition being that 'an amended wage basis will come into operation if the application is accepted'. Mr Bell joined the scheme and a 'reduction' of £2 9*s* a week was made in his wages, later increased to £2 14*s* 6*d*. When an employee was sick and receiving no wage no charge was made for the car. It was understood that Mr Bell could cancel the arrangement at two weeks' notice and revert to full wage. The tax inspector included the £2-odd in the assessment on Mr Bell.

The Special Commissioners allowed Mr Bell's appeal, holding that the wage assessable was the reduced wage, and that the use of the car was not money's worth since it could not be turned into money, the arrangement being personal to the employee. Ungoed-Thomas, J., also held that the wage was the reduced amount, but that the use of the car was a taxable perquisite (46 ATC 219) on the ground that Mr Bell could convert the free use into money by giving a fortnight's notice and reverting to the unreduced wage.

The Court of Appeal found in Mr Bell's favour on both points. It refused to give the Crown leave to appeal but the Crown successfully petitioned to the House of Lords for leave, where four out of five of the law lords held that the assessable wage was the full wage, the 'reduction' being an application by Mr Bell of part of the wage. Three of the five also held that if this was wrong, then the use of the car was a taxable

Bank (and other) reconciliations

by An Industrious Accountant

WHEN I slipped into our canteen for a quick snack lunch, the office manager and his wife, the Hairpin, were quarrelling in whispers over their soup. As I tried to pass she put out her hand to stop me. 'Do join us', she called. 'My poor hubby is the most pig-headed domestic tyrant you ever met, so I want you to talk some sense into him'.

Her husband wore the typical half-angry, half-sheepish expression of a man whose wife parades their differences in public, but he rallied gamely. He'd tell nobody but an old friend, he muttered, but even if shoemakers' wives were proverbially the worst shod, he wouldn't have an accountant's wife the worst housekeeper. She just wouldn't or couldn't keep her household accounts straight and he was putting his foot down at last.

There's nothing I like so much as acting the amateur but benevolent psychologist, so I ordered grapefruit and bade them tell all to their honorary uncle.

It was about their bank account, he said grimly. When they were first married he wrote all the cheques ('old skinflint', she interjected), but later they agreed to have a joint account chargeable on either's signature ('what a struggle I had to get him out of the Dark Ages', she clamoured), but her cheque book was always a shambles. She forgot to enter up the counterfoils ('what does it matter, stupid? The money's gone anyhow') and this nonsense had to stop.

The Hairpin laughed shrilly as she took a second helping of chips and proclaimed that she'd have to have a separate account. All her friends had them; why should her lord and master, ha-ha, be such a stingy old stick-in-the-mud?

He'd stick to his household budget, anyhow, he insisted. All his life he'd entered up his detailed expenditures weekly; he had his private notebooks for years back ('I threw out all that old junk when I was spring-cleaning!') and she'd have to do the same. ('Incompatibility! I could get a divorce for that!') If she didn't comply maybe he'd give her grounds for pleading desertion as well.

His wife had the typical shaken look of a woman who didn't believe him for a moment but suddenly realized she might be wrong this time, so she changed the subject by asking him why he hadn't made a fortune buying equities on a rising market. I started on my boiled ham and told them benignly that all this had happened before.

When David Copperfield married his pretty little feather-headed Dora she tried to keep her household accounts in the old Victorian tradition. She, too, failed. True, she pointed her pencil, bought an immense account book and sat down to her basket of bills, counting all the fingers of her left hand over and over again, backwards and forwards. But the figures wouldn't add up and wouldn't come right and her head ached so.

At this stage, however, the indignant Hairpin, pointed out sharply that she was no lavender-and-lace nitwit, money was earned to be spent and she'd account to nobody for her personal dress allowance. She finished her coffee and flounced out. The OM could only say helplessly that he'd try to persuade her when she recovered her lost temper. She'd come round, never fear; he'd train her gradually.

David, I recall, 'accustomed himself to giving her, as it were quite casually, little scraps of useful information or sound opinion – and she started from them when he let them off, as if they had been crackers. . . . She had an instinctive perception of what he was about, and became a prey to the keenest apprehensions.'

The OM had better tread warily, or the Hairpin will probably start away from him as if he was crackers himself, if he attempts to make her into an unwilling accountant by easy lessons. No integration for her on his terms.

perquisite, i.e., they upheld the view of Ungoed-Thomas, J. However, on this view only 50 weeks' use would be taxable, since Mr Bell had to give a fortnight's notice before he could receive the full wage again.

'Free of income tax' means what it says

THE House of Lords made tax history last week when it reversed the Court of Session's decision in Ferguson v. CIR (46 ATC 381), and upset a decision which has stood for over 42 years. Section 506 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952 imposes a penalty on a person who refuses to allow an authorized deduction of income tax. Section 506 (2) goes on to say that, 'Every agreement for payment of interest, rent or other annual payment in full without allowing any such deduction shall be void'.

As the subsection speaks only of an agreement, it has not been applied to wills or Court orders which have been read as providing for the payment of a larger gross sum less tax. But in Blount v. Blount ([1916] 1 KB 230) it was held that an agreement to pay a specified sum 'free of income tax' was void and that tax must be deducted from the specified sum.

In Ferguson v. CIR the General Commissioners for Midlothian refused to apply Blount v. Blount and held that an agreement to pay £35 a month 'free of income tax' was the same as saying 'such an amount as after the deduction of income tax will leave £35'. They were reversed by the Court of Session but the House of Lords (according to The Times of March 12th) has unanimously upheld the General Commissioners, holding that Blount v. Blount was wrongly decided. The House held that on its proper construction, the agreement was to pay a net sum after deduction of tax and therefore section 506 (2) had no application.

Group Relief

Accounting Treatment of the Relief Granted for Losses within Groups of Companies

The accounting procedures in connection with the treatment of relief granted for groups of companies under section 20 and Schedule 10 of the Finance Act 1967 have not so far received any great amount of attention in the professional press. The Research and Publications Committee of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland believes that they may give rise to certain difficulties and has issued the following notes for guidance.

(1) Group relief

FOR some years it has been recognized in tax law that member companies of groups should have some means of obtaining relief when losses are incurred by one member while profits are earned by other members. Until the passing of the Finance Act 1967 this relief was provided by means of subvention payments: the actual payment was treated as a trading expense of the paying company and a trading receipt of the recipient.

Section 20 and Schedule 10, Finance Act 1967 introduced a different system called group relief, whereby the benefit of a loss can be transferred from one company to another without the need for an actual payment. The provisions of the Act are summarized in the appendix hereto, although reference should always be made to the Act itself in dealing with a particular case. For the purpose of considering the accounting treatment it is necessary to note the following salient points:

(a) A group is defined by reference to the old profits tax rules, i.e., subsidiaries must be at least 75 per cent owned for group relief to be claimable (section 20; and section 42, Finance Act 1938).

(c) The loss for which relief is given and the profit against which it is given must occur in corresponding periods (Schedule 10, paragraph 1).

(d) A payment for group relief made as consideration for the benefit transferred is ignored for tax purposes (section 20 (4)).

(e) Relief cannot be claimed in respect of a group where a profit on the sale of the subsidiary's shares would be treated as a trading receipt (section 20 (7)).

(f) Claims require the consent of the surrendering company and must be made within two years after the end of its relevant accounting period.

Consortium claims require also the consent of each member (Schedule 10, paragraph 10).

(2) Accounting treatment of group relief

The effect of the relief is to reduce the corporation tax liability of the claimant company below the amount which would be chargeable on its own profits: the losses used for this purpose are not available for set-off by the surrendering company in a later year when such company is again earning taxable profits.

It is considered that no special accounting adjustments affecting the tax charge are required where group relief has been claimed in respect of a trading loss. The relief is an outright transfer, not a deferment, and the liabilities of the two companies involved are altered once and for all. However, the treatment of inter-company payments for group relief may need consideration: these are dealt with in (3) below. The inclusion of capital allowances in a claim for group relief and its effects in relation to the tax equalization account are considered in (4).

In the case of relief passing between members of a group, it is only the tax charges in the separate company accounts which will bear an abnormal relationship to their profits: the tax charge in the consolidated accounts will bear a normal relationship to the consolidated profit. The following example illustrates this:

	Surrendering company	Claimant company		Group
	£	£	£	£
Profit before tax			100,000	80,000
Trading loss ..	20,000
Tax charges: 42½ per cent on £100,000 ..		42,500
Less Group relief (42½ per cent on £20,000) ..		8,500
			34,000	34,000*
Loss/profit after tax	£20,000		£66,000	£46,000

* Equal to 42½ per cent on £80,000.

It is important that where a company's tax charge is significantly reduced by group relief a note on the accounts should disclose this in accordance with Schedule 2, paragraph 14 (3A), Companies Act 1967, and similarly a note on the accounts of the surrendering company should disclose that losses have been transferred.

(3) Treatment of payments for group relief

Where group relief affects subsidiaries with minority shareholders it is desirable that a suitable payment should pass to the surrendering company: the amount may be rather less than the full value of the relief, to the extent that the surrendering company is receiving the benefit of the relief earlier than it would normally.

In the case of a wholly-owned subsidiary there is no case on accounting grounds for going to the trouble of making such a payment, particularly if there is a note to the accounts disclosing that relief is being claimed. There may, however, be other grounds for making a payment: as always, where close companies are involved special care is required to avoid undesirable side-effects of any transaction. For instance, if it is assumed in the above example that next year the surrendering company makes a profit of £20,000 and provides for the tax of £8,500, it will be left with an accumulated debit balance on profit and loss account of £8,500. It is probably undesirable commercially and may be illegal for it to pay a dividend, but if it does not do so, subject to the exempting provisions of section 77, Finance Act 1965, it may then suffer a shortfall assessment on 60 per cent of £11,500. The solution in this and other such cases may well be to make a payment for group relief.

A different set of circumstances may arise if there is a possibility of the company being put into liquidation and not paying its debts in full, and here the directors should ensure that the creditors are protected by arranging for a payment.

A payment for group relief should be included in the tax charge (or credit) in the accounts of both the claimant and the surrendering companies. Although it can be argued to the contrary, on the basis that the tax charge (or refund) should include only actual tax liabilities to or payments from the Inland Revenue, in fact the relationship of the profit before tax to the tax charge is distorted if such payment (or receipt) is included in profit before tax. Moreover, the payment does in practical terms stand in the place of the transferred tax relief.

The effect of this treatment may be simply illustrated by reference to the accounts of a claimant company which is assumed to have a profit before tax of £100,000 and to be claiming group relief on £50,000 for which it pays £20,000:

Profit before tax		100,000
Taxation		41,250
Comprising:
Corporation tax on profit	42,500
Less: Group relief	21,250
	21,250
Payment for group relief . ..	20,000
	£41,250
Profit after tax		£58,750

It will be seen that the profit before tax is not distorted and there is only a slight distortion of the tax charge. It is emphasized that if the payment is significant in relation to the total tax charge then it should be disclosed either in the accounts or in a note, to

An adequate REWARD

Just think for a minute about your senior staff. Responsible people, working under pressure most of the time. Men who would be hard to replace. Are they being adequately rewarded? One of the best ways for a company to show its appreciation of its senior staff is by giving them extra pension. The Norwich Union 10% Pension Plan with profits can provide key personnel with a very valuable reward during their retirement, while at the same time it offers real advantages to the company.

Your insurance broker or local Norwich Union Office will be pleased to submit a quotation, or write to us at Norwich.

What the 10% Pension Plan offers:—

★ A pension on retirement, or ten times the yearly pension as a single payment on earlier death.
★ Both these benefits are enhanced by yearly compound bonuses.
★ 25% of the pension is commutable for tax-free cash on retirement.
★ The plan can be arranged for individuals or groups.
★ The payments made by the company are regarded as an expense of management and not as income of the employee for tax purposes.

comply with Schedule 2, paragraph 12 (1) (c), Companies Act 1967. Such disclosure may be necessary in the accounts of both the claimant and surrendering companies.

If the payment for group relief were to be included in the profit before tax it will be seen that in the above example the profit before tax would be £80,000 and the tax charge £21,250 – a severe distortion.

It could, of course, happen that the tax relief is obtained in one year and the payment made in another year: in such a case suitable adjustments should be made by the claimant and surrendering companies to bring them both into the same year's group accounts.

Circumstances may make it desirable for claimant members of a consortium to make payments for group relief to the consortium company. This will certainly be the case where not all members of the consortium are claiming their full share of the relief, because otherwise the claimant companies would receive an advantage over the other members. The accounting treatment should be the same as the treatment suggested above for groups: in this case, however, it is not necessary for the relief and the payments to appear in the same year's accounts of the respective companies.

(4) Effect on tax equalization accounts

The inclusion of the surrendering company's capital allowances in a claim for group relief will normally affect the working of its tax equalization accounts: the capital allowances so included should be treated as utilized immediately. The tax charge will be higher than normal, reflecting the surrender of the relief.

In the claimant company's accounts the receipt of group relief will produce a subnormal tax charge in the same way as group relief for a trading loss.

If a payment for group relief is made the surrendering company is receiving the benefit of its capital allowances without any delay and again it should treat them as utilized.

The following illustrations clarify the treatment:

(a) Surrendering company with an accounting profit after depreciation of £10,000 but an adjusted loss of £5,000 (after deducting capital allowances). Group relief of £5,000 claimed. No payment for group relief.

Profit before tax			10,000
Taxation			6,375
Comprising:
Corporation tax		Nil
Transfer to tax equalization account:
Excess of capital allowances over depreciation	15,000
42½ per cent thereon		6,375
		£6,375
Profit after tax			£3,625

The relief in the claimant company is 42½ per cent of £5,000, a benefit of £2,125 which counterbalances the excess charge in the surrendering company so that the total charge is normal.

(b) Same facts as in (a), but a payment for group relief of £2,000 is received.

Profits before tax			10,000
Taxation			4,375
Comprising:
Corporation tax		Nil
Transfer to tax equalization account:
Excess of capital allowances over depreciation	15,000
42½ per cent thereon		6,375
Less: Payment for group relief		2,000
		£4,375
Profit after tax			£5,625

In this case the payment for group relief makes the tax charge in the accounts of both the surrendering and claimant companies normal; the total group charge is of course also normal.

It could be argued that the increase in the tax charge of the surrendering company should appear in a later year, at the time when the allowances would in fact have been utilized if they had not been included in the claim. However, this treatment entails an adjustment in the claimant company's tax equalization computation in order to preserve the correct group result. Because of the added complexity it is not recommended.

In consortium companies there is no need to relate the treatment in the respective accounts of the claimant and surrendering companies. There is, however, no reason to change the treatment described in the above illustration.

(5) Other considerations

Because two years are allowed in which to make a claim, it may not be known at the time of preparing the accounts whether group relief will be claimed, and if so, whether and what payments for group relief will be made.

The accounts should reflect the action intended when they are drawn up, and nothing is lost if these intentions subsequently change.

Group relief and any associated payments which relate to a previous year should, if material, be shown as a prior year's adjustment in the accounts.

It has not been the general practice for companies to make reference in their accounts to past losses which are being carried forward for tax purposes in order to obtain the benefit of loss reliefs. The question of whether such disclosure should be made is one that merits further consideration and investigation.

(6) Conclusions

In summary:

(a) Group relief can distort the tax charges of both the claimant and surrendering companies.

(b) This distortion will be minimized if payments for group relief are made and are included in the tax charges of the claimant and surrendering companies.

(c) The making of payments for group relief is particularly necessary in relation to partly-owned subsidiaries and consortia because the interests of third parties are affected.

(d) Payments for group relief will normally be somewhat less than the full value of the relief, because the surrendering company can look for only the discounted value.

(e) In dealing with groups of companies it is essential that the entries in the accounts of the surrendering and claimant companies should be complementary, in order that the correct group picture is given.

(f) Where capital allowances are included in claims for group relief it is simplest for group purposes to treat them as utilized by the surrendering company in calculating the movements on its tax equalization account, and this course is recommended. The resulting distortion of tax charges is minimized if payments for group relief are made, just as in the case of relief for trading losses.

(g) If group relief or a payment therefor are significant in relation to a company's total tax charge, the position should be disclosed either in the accounts or in a note in order that a true and fair view is given and also to comply with Schedule 2, paragraphs 12 (1) (c) and 14 (3A), Companies Act 1967.

Subsidiary	A company 75 per cent or more of whose ordinary capital is owned by another company, i.e., broadly the definition in section 42, Finance Act 1938 (section 20 (6)). Shares held as trading stock are ignored (section 20 (7) (a)).
Holding company	A company whose business consists of owning shares in 90 per cent subsidiaries which are trading companies (section 20 (6)).
90 per cent subsidiary	A company not less than 90 per cent of whose ordinary share capital is directly owned by another (section 20 (8) (a)).
Members of a consortium	Those five or fewer companies, which between them own all the ordinary share capital of another company (section 20 (8) (b)).
Member's share in a consortium	The member's average percentage interest in the surrendering company in the relevant accounting period (section 20 (8) (c)).
Group of companies	Two companies are members of a group if one is the subsidiary of the other or they are both subsidiaries of a third.
Trading company	A company whose main or sole business is the carrying on of a trade.
Company	Company resident in the UK.

Sums qualifying for relief

Trading losses including capital allowances of a member of a group (section 20 (1) and Schedule 10, paragraph 1) or of a trading or holding company owned by a consortium, or a trading company which is a 90 per cent subsidiary of a holding company owned by a consortium (section 20 (2)).

Excess of capital allowances of an investment company over income (Schedule 10, paragraph 2).

Excess of expenses of management of an investment company over its profits (Schedule 10, paragraph 3).

Excess of charges on income over profits (Schedule 10, paragraph 4).

General provisions

Subvention payments under section 20, Finance Act 1953 do not operate in respect of accounting periods ending after July 21st, 1967 (section 20 (5)).

Group relief is deducted from the claimant company's profits after any other relief except reliefs derived from a subsequent accounting period. It cannot itself be carried forward (Schedule 10, paragraph 5).

Any accounting period of the claimant company falling wholly or partly within an accounting period of the surrendering company corresponds to that accounting period. Provision is made for relief to be reduced by apportionments on a time basis if the periods do not coincide (Schedule 10, paragraph 6). Time apportionments are also made if the members of a group or consortium change during an accounting period (Schedule 10, paragraphs 7, 8).

Double reliefs are excluded (Schedule 10, paragraph 9).

Claims need not be for the full amount available. Consent of the surrendering company is required. Claims must be made within two years of the end of the surrendering company's accounting period (Schedule 10, paragraph 10).

Special provisions concern the three-year surplus, overseas trading income, transactions to avoid tax (Schedule 10, paragraphs 11, 12, 13).

Consortia

A member of a consortium can claim only its share of the loss (Schedule 10, paragraph 1).

Claims can be made simultaneously by more than one member of a consortium (section 20 (3)).

Consent of surrendering company and each member of consortium required (Schedule 10, paragraph 10).

Who is an Employee?

by DOUGLAS BROWN, LL.B., M.A.

IT is a truism these days that from a financial point of view employers must be careful in the number of employees they engage. No longer is it merely a question of wages. The taking on of an employee results in the employer becoming liable for payment of his National Insurance contributions to which have now been added selective employment tax and redundancy payment contributions. Even if he is entitled to refund of selective employment tax, the employer is out of pocket until the money is repaid.

Nor do the financial implications end there. An employer is vicariously liable for torts committed by the employee in the course of his employment. For example, if a driver employed by an oil company throws a match after lighting a cigarette upon the floor of a garage whilst delivering petrol, the oil company is liable for the resulting damage (Century Insurance Co Ltd v. Northern Ireland Road Transport Board [1942] AC 509 (HL)).

Again the employer is liable where appropriate for a levy on the total emoluments paid to employees in respect of the Industrial Training Act 1964. He may become liable for redundancy payments and the rebate he will receive from the redundancy fund will only go part of the way towards meeting the cost (Redundancy Payments Act 1965).

Yet another consideration today is that whilst at common law the employer is free to negotiate wages with each individual employee, in practice his freedom to negotiate may be restricted or circumscribed by the terms of a collective agreement. If he attempts to deviate, the employer may find himself in difficulties with a trade union.

The answer often lies in companies, firms or other entrepreneurs putting out as much work as possible to contract. Wherever it is possible to get a job done as efficiently by an independent contractor as by an employee, then it must save money to engage the independent contractor. It may be much cheaper to engage a man driving his own lorry exclusively for the company, than to employ a driver to operate the company's own lorry.

Employee and independent contractor

This raises the question as to who is an employee and who is an independent contractor. The distinction is one which has troubled the law for many years. Imagine for example, a householder who engages a man to clear the drains. Does the man become an employee for the duration of his work? Or is he an independent contractor? Over a century ago he was deemed by the courts to be an employee (Sadler v. Henlock (1855) 24 LJQB 138). Today, he would be in all probability an independent contractor.

While there is a wealth of case law on the subject, none of the cases is particularly illuminating on the tests that should be followed. 'It is a question of fact to be decided by all the circumstances of the case' was how one judge summed up the position (Fletcher Moulton, L.J., in Simmons v. Health Laundry Co [1910] 1 KB 534).

Four tests

Where the advice of accountants is sought on this matter, the following tests may prove helpful in determining the difference.

(1) What does the contract say? Does it describe the contract as one of employment? Is the person to do the work described as an employee? If the contract says he is an employee then the presumption is that the contract is 'of service' as distinct from 'for services', though this is not conclusive proof. The courts will look to the substance of the agreement to determine its nature. But it is a good starting-point. If work is to be done and the company or firm wishes to avoid engaging an employee, then the contract should state unequivocally

(i) that it is a contract for services;

(ii) that the person doing the work is an independent contractor; and

(iii) that he is personally liable to third parties for any damage arising out of the work.

(2) Who pays the National Insurance contribution? Once an employer agrees to pay his portion of the total contribution, he will not be able to convince the courts that the person doing the work is not an employee. The person requiring the work to be done should make sure he is engaging a self-employed person; or at any rate he should ensure that someone else is responsible for paying the contribution. However, it may be noted that an employee may have two or more employers and simply because he is someone else's employee will not necessarily mean that he is not an employee of the second employer.

(3) Does the contract have all or most of the attributes of a contract of employment? Does it include provision not only for payment of a wage, but also for such matters as holidays, notice, dismissal, suspension, superannuation or pension, sickness, injury and hours of work? If it does, then it is a contract of employment. If it does not, and it is simply a contract to undertake a particular task, then prima facie, it is a contract for services.

(4) What measure of control is exercised over the work? This is the traditional test. Where a crane was hired out with its driver, Lord Uthwatt said that the proper test to apply was 'whether or not the hirer had authority to control the manner of execution of the act in question' (Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Coggins and Griffiths (Liverpool) Ltd [1946] 2 All ER 345). But the test is not satisfactory because there can be instances of skilled workers (e.g., doctors and scientists) who are employees where there is little control over their work apart from payment; and there can be a contract for services where there is very strict control. For example, where a local authority engaged a consultant engineer who took almost all his instructions from a firm of consultants and the local authority only exercised a minimal amount of control, it was nevertheless held to be a contract of service (Morren v. Swinton and Pendlebury Borough Council [1965] 2 All ER 349). However, the test remains a valid one.

Conclusion

None of the four tests is adequate by itself. Each test has to be applied to each instance. But the situation has to be examined as a whole and it has not been possible to devise a points system to determine positively an answer that will fit all circumstances. A married woman who was intermittently engaged by a market research company to act as an interviewer for a fixed remuneration following detailed instructions was held to be an employee (Market Investigations Ltd v. Minister of Social Security [1969] 2 WLR 1). So likewise was a managing director of a one-man company carrying on a garage business who owned 99½ per cent of the shares (Road Transport Industry Training Board v. Readers Garage [1969] The Times, January 31st).

But a sales representative of typewriters and typewriting courses whose sole remuneration was a commission on sales with no expenses paid, was held to be an independent contractor (Willy Scheidegger Swiss Typewriting School (London) v. Minister of Social Security [1968] 5 KIR 65). The distinction will continue to be one that is difficult to determine in certain situations.

MANAGEMENT INFORMATION

The Determinants of Market Share

THE share of a market that a company can carve out for its products will have a significant effect upon the current and future prosperity of the business. In order to be able to play their full part in the management processes which lead up to the achieved profitability level, those concerned with marketing should fully understand the factors which will determine the market share of a particular product.

This understanding will be based upon an appreciation of the likely effects of the different courses of action that a business can pursue to expand its market share. These will include:

(a) Varying the product price.

(b) Varying the level of advertising and the media used.

(c) Changing the sales outlets used and distribution techniques to vary the retail availability.

(d) Varying the physical characteristics of the product and its presentation.

The decision made will probably embody a combination of these alternatives rather than the use of a single alternative. The problem lies in the selection of the right combination of alternatives and the emphasis that should be placed upon each.

Fundamental to this decision process is a knowledge of the impact that a change in one of the variables is likely to have upon the overall result. Such a knowledge will be based upon empirical studies of changes in the variables and the market share over periods of time, so that an assessment of likely consequences can be made.

A study along these lines is contained in an article by Professor Doyle L. Weiss entitled, 'Determinants of market share', which has appeared in the Journal of Marketing Research. The data upon which the article is based was the result of a study of a low-cost, frequently purchased, brand identified consumer food product and four years of family purchase records and estimates of competitive advertising expenditure in the Chicago area. The product class which was the subject of the study contains four strong brands which together dominate the market and account for about 65 per cent by volume of product sales. The trend in market shares for each of the four major brands is shown in Fig. 1, brands 1, 2, and 4 being nationally advertised brands and brand 3 a regional brand.

Within the survey of semi-annual market shares used to build up the data in Fig. 1, estimates were also made of advertising expenditure, prices and relative market shares in respect of the three national brands only. Since package size and shape were not used competitively for the product, and it was not greatly affected by a proliferation of flavours, the major determinants of market share over the period covered were price and the level of advertising. The data collected are presented in the article in tables showing (a) the comparative prices for the three national brands over the four years; (b) the comparative advertising expenditure on each brand; and (c) the comparative market shares.

For the purpose of this review the data in each of the three tables has been extracted and combined into a single graph for each brand. For example, Fig. 2 presents in respect of brand 1 the prices at which the product was sold, the amount of advertising expenditure upon it, and the resulting market share in relation to the other two brands.

The correlation between changes in price and advertising expenditure upon market share is clearly shown in this presentation. Increases in price are accompanied by decreases in market shares and vice versa; increases in advertising expenditure are accompanied by increasing market share. Where advertising expenditure and price move in directions that would affect market share in opposing ways, the price movement appears to be dominant.

Figs 3 and 4 show the same data in respect of brands 2 and 4. An individual company's market share will be determined not only by decisions made by management, but also the decisions being made by competing businesses. In Fig. 1 it can be seen that in 1962, the market share of brand 3 (for which the bi-monthly figures were unfortunately not given) began to rise strongly. The unsettling effect that this had upon the decision making affected the other three brands – particularly in regard to advertising expenditure – is shown by the sharp movements in the relevant brand data.

To complete one's understanding of the determinants of market share it is necessary to quantify in some way the dominance of particular factors in the overall decision. For example, is the product price dominant over all other factors, and if so, to what extent? This quantitative appreciation must be allied with an understanding of the interaction between firms in a competitive situation. Finally, and this factor must never be overlooked, the likely outcome of the decisions being taken must be appraised in terms of profitability.

Some of the steps in this process were outlined in the article. The approach selected was with the use of econometric models (the mathematical basis for which was fully discussed in the article) to determine the coefficients of advertising and price. Those variables not included in the data presented in the accompanying graphs (e.g., product quality etc.) were represented in the models by dummy variables.

Brand 4 Price Advertising Expenditure and Market Share

The amalgamation of the field research and mathematical analysis in this way has important implications:

(1) When cost structures are added to the analysis and their parameters estimated, the models become normative models for firm behaviour and descriptive models of market share behaviour. As such they may be examined for short-run optimal price and advertising decisions.

(2) The models may be used as forecasting mechanisms to examine the probable effect of current merchandising policies on market share position and company profits.

Income tax – Investment companies – Management expenses claims – Amount of tax on equivalent income – Double taxation relief – Whether tax at standard rate – Or at effective rates on various parts of income – Rate at which repayment allowable on dividends – Income Tax Act 1918, section 33 – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 181, 184, 350, 425 – Finance Act 1954, section 19.

The companies were investment companies and all their incomes were in one or other of three forms: (a) dividends from which the paying companies had deducted United Kingdom tax at the standard rate, and as to which they had no claim to double taxation relief, (b) dividends from companies, themselves entitled to double taxation relief, but from which United Kingdom tax had been deducted at the standard rate, and in respect of which relief was by section 350 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952 limited to the net United Kingdom rate borne by the paying company, (c) foreign income on which the respondent companies were directly assessed, but were entitled to double taxation relief for foreign tax.

The respondent companies had not been assessed under Case I of Schedule D, but had been charged to tax by deduction or by assessment otherwise. They claimed relief for management expenses for 1960–61 and 1958–59 respectively. It was conceded (i) that the respondent companies' liability to United Kingdom tax, taking double taxation relief into account, had to be ascertained before the amount of tax repayable could be calculated, (ii) that the amount of the 'tax on any sums disbursed as expenses of management' meant tax on that part of the taxed income as is equivalent to the amount of the management expenses. The dispute was over the meaning of 'the amount of the tax' in the phrase just quoted.

It was contended for the companies that these words meant tax at the standard rate after taking double taxation relief into account pursuant to section 350 (1) (a). For the Revenue it was contended that the words meant tax at the rates effectively borne by the various parts of the income in question; but that the management expenses could be attributable, as far as possible, to the parts which had borne tax at the highest rate.

Held (reversing the Special Commissioners' decision): the contention for the Revenue was correct.

A subsidiary point was argued in the High Court as to whether, if tax was deducted against the respondent companies at a rate higher than the effective United Kingdom rate of the paying company, the management expenses claim should be based on the higher or the lower rate. It was decided that repayment was allowable at the lower rate.

Income tax – Trading stock – Valuation – Stock unsold at end of period – Whether replacement cost wholesale to be taken – Or cost or market value retail – Whether long-established practice should be disturbed – Whether overhead expenses deductible – Income Tax Act 1952, section 127.

The company, a shoe retailer, had to keep large stocks, and at the end of every trading period it had on hand a number of shoes equal to about one-third of the number sold during the period. Shoes were purchased by the company at a price calculated by reference to a 'mark-up', which was fixed by the directors, and which was the percentage margin between the wholesale buying price and the retail selling price that would produce the rate of profit considered appropriate. Some of the shoes in hand at the end of the period would be sold at reduced prices in the January sales, and some at still lower prices subsequently.

The practice followed by the company for at least thirty years was to value the stock unsold at the end of a trading period at replacement value, i.e., the wholesale cost. For the year of assessment in question the Revenue claimed that the stock unsold at the end of the relevant accounting period should be brought into account for tax purposes at cost or at the then retail price less directly referable expenses such as seller's commission. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the Revenue.

Held: the Special Commissioners' decision was correct. The question whether there should be a deduction for overhead expenses was not argued before the Special Commissioners or before the Court.

Integration of the Profession

English Institute's Area Meetings

THIS week, with notices convening a special meeting on April 17th in the Royal Albert Hall, members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales have received copies of a report from the Council on the 65 local meetings held in recent months (51 in England, Wales and Scotland, and 14 overseas) to discuss the scheme for the development of the accountancy profession in the British Isles, together with a summary of the main points raised by members and the replies of Council representatives.

For the benefit of many of our readers who are members of the other participating bodies the report and the summary are reproduced on this and the following pages. In the summary on pages 409–412, the points raised appear in roman type and the official replies are in italics.

REPORT ON THE MEETINGS HELD IN DISTRICT SOCIETY AREAS FROM SEPTEMBER TO DECEMBER 1968 AND IN CERTAIN OVERSEAS CENTRES DURING JANUARY 1969

REPRESENTATIVES of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales have, during the past six months, attended 51 meetings in England and Wales and in Scotland and 14 meetings in a number of countries overseas. Any member, in England and Wales at least, who has had doubts or reservations about the proposals should, accordingly, have had an opportunity of attending one of the meetings which have been held in all district society areas.

2. At most meetings, at home and overseas, there was a show of hands to obtain the general sense of the meeting on the scheme taken as a whole. The Council has been greatly encouraged by the strength of the support given to its proposals for the development of the profession by the 7,000 members who attended the meetings. Although some members were critical of certain aspects, no member raised any major point which had not been fully considered and debated before the proposals were issued in July 1968 – which is not surprising since the views of over 1,200 members of this Institute alone were obtained at various stages during the formulation of the proposals. For the benefit of members who were unable to attend any meetings, the main issues are now set out in this memorandum and annexed is a summary of those aspects about which further information was requested or criticisms were made together with the replies which were given by the Council's representatives at the various meetings.

3. There are, however, two points which the Council has decided should receive further consideration. These are:

(a) the proposed description and designatory letters for members holding a junior qualification; and

(b) the number and timing of the proposed examinations for chartered accountant students.

4. There are also two matters of detail concerning the proposals for training chartered accountant students which the Council has decided should be changed. These concern:

(a) the probationary period of service under a training contract – which should be extended from three to six months; and

(b) the permissible period of secondment to firms or organizations overseas – which should be extended from six months to a total of 12 months in exceptional circumstances within the discretion of the Council.

Background to the proposals

5. In recent years, the more important developments affecting the Institute have been:

(a) continuing growth in the scope and complexity of the work required of professional accountants, calling for an increasing diversity of intellectual ability, experience and technical competence;

(b) a greatly increased recognition of the positive contribution which the accountancy profession can make to the efficiency of business management, reflected not only in the large and growing proportion of members of the Institute who are now pursuing a career in industry, commerce or the public service, but also in the increasing attention paid to this aspect by those who remain on the practising side of the profession;

(c) an increasing overlapping of the skills required of professional accountants whatever their occupation may be, and an increasing need for a common basic professional qualification from which to develop a superstructure of advanced specialisms;

(d) the changing pattern of education, in particular the expansion of the national facilities for further education, the growing importance of oral tuition and the progressive displacement of the correspondence course as the primary means of theoretical study;

(e) the undoubted growth of the status of the other leading accountancy bodies, a growing challenge from other (non-accountancy) bodies and educational disciplines, and an increasing tendency of industry to train its own candidates for its higher accounting and financial positions.

Essentials of the scheme

6. The prerequisites for retaining the Institute's position as a leading professional body are:

(a) the introduction of higher standards of professional training and examinations;

(b) the maintenance of the reputation of its members for professional integrity.

7. Raising of standards

(a) Standards can be raised only if candidates are required to possess a high level of intellectual ability from the outset. (The wastage rate of 'O' level candidates is significantly higher than is the case with 'A' level and graduate candidates.)

(b) Raising the standard of the professional examination involves both an extension of the syllabus to cover additional subjects, in particular those which are management orientated, and greater depth of study.

(c) Raising the standard of professional training involves closer supervision of the facilities which members can provide and the correlation of those facilities and the subjects in the extended syllabus.

(d) Unless other measures are taken, the problems which arise from the foregoing considerations may be summarized as follows:

(i) If educational entry standards are raised:
many potential candidates who could make a worthwhile contribution to the work in members' offices will be denied the opportunity of a qualification conferred by the Institute; recruitment to some offices will suffer because the higher level of entrant will not be content with some of the work now carried out by articled clerks.

(ii) If the examination syllabus is extended and greater depth of study is required:
a longer period to qualification will be required (this could have a detrimental effect on recruitment); all possible facilities for full-time study must be enlisted and such financial help as may be available from local education authorities must be obtained.

(iii) If strict supervision is exercised over training facilities and those facilities are to be related to the examination syllabus:
notwithstanding that existing rights will be protected, some offices will be unable to take chartered accountant students and, in due course, fewer places than at present will become available for future candidates; practical training in management orientated subjects must be permissible in industry and commerce since many practising offices do not have the required facilities.

(e) In the view of the Council, the right solution to these problems is:

(i) to raise the minimum education entry standard;

(ii) to introduce, contemporaneously, a junior qualification to meet the need for accountancy technicians;

(iii) to introduce an element of specialization after the intermediate examination stage so as to cover, in sufficient depth, the more particular requirements of those who intend to pursue their career in industry, commerce or the public service;

(iv) in consequence, to extend the present arrangements for training in practising offices to industry, commerce and the public service;

(v) to present, to the educational bodies, uniform requirements for the accountancy profession as a whole.

8. Maintenance of professional integrity

(a) The Council believes that the reputation of members for professional integrity stems from the system of articles whereby a principal has a positive duty in respect of the professional upbringing of his students. This does not mean that persons who have been trained in other ways necessarily lack this quality but it is a system which tends to confer upon all a proper understanding of ethical conduct and behaviour. It is this system, under the new description 'training contract', which the Council intends to retain wherever a student may be trained.

(b) There is little doubt that neither employers nor prospective students will willingly undertake to comply with the somewhat onerous provisions of the proposed training contracts if alternative and easier ways of obtaining practical training are to continue to be available.

(c) The inescapable conclusion to be drawn is that if the developments outlined in paragraph 7 are to be implemented, then integration of the other bodies which now train in industry, commerce and the public service is essential to make those developments viable.

Conclusion

9. It is the belief of the Council that, quite apart from the duty imposed upon it by the supplemental Royal Charter to aim at 'the elevation of the accountancy profession as a whole', it is in the best interests of the Institute to implement a scheme for the development of the accountancy profession on the general lines indicated in the document which was issued in July 1968.

10. There are additional benefits which should flow from implementation of such a scheme although these are not necessarily the prime considerations These are:

(a) that, in the longer term, a clearer image of the accountancy profession will be presented to the public;

(b) that more effective use will be made of the resources of the present major accountancy bodies;

(c) that the profession will be able to speak more quickly and effectively to the Government, to the public and to other bodies;

(d) that grant aid is likely to be available for professional education on a wider basis than at present; and

(e) that competition and duplication of effort on recruitment will be eliminated.

11. Without integration, the cohesion of the scheme will be broken. The junior qualification, an essential consequence of the raising of standards, might be difficult to establish; training in industry, with the restrictions which the training contract imposes, will be unlikely to gain general acceptance either with employers or candidates; and efforts to place the weight of theoretical training upon the State educational system will meet serious problems. Even more important, perhaps, than these problems will be the failure of the Institute properly to represent all its members, or the profession as a whole.

SUMMARY OF THE MAIN POINTS RAISED BY MEMBERS TOGETHER WITH THE VIEWS OF THE COUNCIL AS EXPRESSED BY ITS REPRESENTATIVES AT DISTRICT SOCIETY AND OTHER MEETINGS.

(1) Minimum educational entry standard for chartered accountant students.

(a) Progress towards a graduate only entry should be more rapid. The contrary view is that the level at which the professional examinations are set should be sufficient to establish the minimum standard to be required of qualified members without any change in the present entry requirements (if this is not the principle to be adopted, many potential recruits will be denied the opportunity of becoming chartered accountants except after progression from the junior qualification).

(a) (i) There is a tendency for members to compare their own education attainments as school leavers without appreciating the changing pattern of national education. For example, those members who entered into articles before the Second World War did so at a time when the minimum requirements were equivalent to those for university entry. The Institute's entry requirements since then have remained approximately the same in terms of passes at school leaving examinations whereas university entry requirements have advanced.

(ii) The information available to the Council indicates clearly that a much higher proportion of 'O' level candidates fail to qualify (either through withdrawal or examination failure) than is the case with the university graduate or two 'A' level entrant.

(b) There should be no limitation on the number of accounting and related subjects which are acceptable for the minimum entry requirement.

(b) The aim is to attract candidates with as broad a general education as possible. To this end, a considerable amount of thought is being given to the best way of making entry into the profession attractive to arts graduates let alone to school leavers who have sat for their General Certificate of Education in professionally unrelated subjects (other than mathematics and English language, both of which are thought to be essential at that level at least).

(2) Professional examinations

(a) The practical application of the proposals relating to the number and timing of professional examinations for chartered accountant students will present problems to principals.

(a) The number and timing of examinations is still being considered. The problems which the Council has yet to solve arise from the need to conform with the normal academic year and from the desire to establish a system of professional education which will encourage students to study progressively throughout their studentship. It is the view of the Council that these problems must be overcome so that all students are not away from their offices at the same time each year.

(b) Is it not possible to have a basic qualification for which there could be common papers throughout and leaving specialization until after qualification?

(b) The need to introduce an element of specialization early in a student's career is inevitable if the syllabuses are to cover, in sufficient depth, the wide range of subjects with which accountants now have to deal. Even so, qualification will only indicate a basic minimum of general expertise upon which post-qualification specialisms can be grafted.

(c) The proposed syllabuses for chartered accountant students (particularly for the practising stream) seem too unimaginative to be attractive to graduates.

(c) The comments about the scope of the syllabuses are due largely to a decision not to include details in the document which was issued to members in July 1968. This decision had been taken because the first examination would not be held at least until 1972. It is thought to be premature to settle final details at this point in time. Outline syllabuses have, in fact, been prepared in considerable detail and the Council is confident that members will have little cause for criticism when these are published.

(3) Professional training

(a) Training elsewhere than in practising offices can neither offer breadth of experience nor confer the necessary qualities of objectivity and independence (particularly when the principal has himself been trained elsewhere than in a practising office). The first loyalty of a student trained in industry is to the company by whom he is employed.

On the other hand, some members in industry, commerce and the public service claim that their organizations have better facilities for training than are available in many practising offices; in addition they have excellent candidates for the profession whom, because of the present restrictions on training, they are unable to train for their own Institute and to whom they can only offer facilities to enable them to qualify for the ACCA, ICWA or IMTA.

(a) (i) It is the view of the Council that training elsewhere than in the office of a practitioner is not incompatible with the concept of a profession. It is difficult, for example, to argue that the law is not a learned profession yet neither barristers nor solicitors need necessarily obtain their training in the offices of practitioners (in the sense that this term is used in relation to accountants) nor is experience in a practitioner's office a necessary prerequisite to the grant of a practising certificate to a solicitor (as it is, under the scheme, for a chartered accountant who performs reserved functions).

(ii) Parliament has not, so far at least, recognized training obtained in a practitioner's office as being an essential prerequisite to acceptance of appointment as auditor of companies covered by the Acts of 1948 to 1967. All members of the ACCA are entitled, under these Acts, to accept any appointment as auditor yet the great majority of such members have not obtained any 'appropriate experience' on the lines set out in the scheme. The ACCA had recognized this deficiency and had introduced, in 1960, a new article into its constitution which, while protecting the rights of members and students registered at that date, rendered ineligible for a practising certificate any members (not so protected) who have not first obtained '30 months' appropriate experience'. It is this provision which is perpetuated in the present scheme. Apart from a few members with 'sitting tenant's rights', no practising member of an enlarged Institute will be eligible to perform reserved functions under the description 'chartered accountant' unless he has obtained, before or after qualifying, thirty months' appropriate experience.

(iii) It is a basic ethic of the members of the IMTA that, in performing their professional duties, they have a responsibility to the public which can override their responsibility to their employers. The 'independence' of the chartered municipal treasurer is a professional quality which is maintained in situations in which it is continually tested. This quality has a long tradition and is universally recognized and respected.

(iv) The Council holds the view that under proper training arrangements whereby a member of the Institute is charged with the duty of looking after the professional upbringing of his students there will be no diminution in the professional standards and ethics now recognized in and expected of chartered accountants. At present, because of the very nature of the training arrangements, there can be little opportunity to teach ethical conduct to candidates for the profession who obtain their basic experience in industry. They enter industry as a member of the staff of a company to whom they owe their loyalty – the training they receive is wholly in technical skills. Under the scheme, however, all accountants whether trained in industry or in practice will be required to comply with a uniform high standard of ethical conduct and practice. This is a fundamental feature of the integration proposals. Because of the wide variation in responsibilities which accountants undertake and the differing environments in which they operate, the challenges which they face necessarily differ in context though not in kind. Special arrangements are, however, necessary to safeguard the relationship between the public and the profession and, in particular, to maintain public confidence in the integrity and objectivity of the accountant in public practice. For this reason, the Council will be charged, under the Royal Charter, to safeguard professional independence.

(b) A compromise might be possible whereby provision is made for a student to spend part of his service in a practising office and part in industry, commerce or the public service.

(b) (i) Provision is made in the scheme for secondment to another stream of training for a limited period. Further consideration will be given to this question with a view to deciding whether greater latitude may be desirable. It is, however, not practicable, without extending the time available for training students, for any substantial degree of training to take place in more than one stream. To extend the training period, for this or any other purpose, would have a detrimental effect upon recruitment.

(ii) Nor is it realistic to expect any firm or organization to pay students salaries at their present level if there is little prospect of the students making a proper contribution to the work of that firm or organization.

(c) The conditions with which industrial, commercial and public service organizations will have to comply in order to accept students are too onerous. There will not be sufficient places available to meet the demand.

(c) The Council has recognized that the conditions imposed upon industry, commerce and the public service by the proposed training contracts will be onerous. Nevertheless, to equal the present level of entry to qualified membership of the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA, only some 1,000 candidates each year will be required to obtain their training in industry and commerce and some 450 candidates each year in the public service. With a wastage rate of 20 to 30 per cent this scale of recruitment will equal the present rates of admission to qualified membership of these three bodies. It is the belief of the Council that such a requirement will be easily attainable and that it will, in fact, be exceeded and thereby help to provide the means for making good the present shortfall in qualified accountants of the right calibre. When such rates of recruitment and admission are compared with the current recruitment and admission figures for the Institute (respectively over 4,000 and over 2,000 annually) it can be seen that the main avenue for admission is likely to continue to be through the offices of practitioners. The large number of candidates who now fail to qualify for membership of the ACCA or ICWA will have available to them the proposed junior qualification which should be within the reach of many.

(d) Practitioners will experience greater difficulty obtaining students because of the attractions of training in industry.

(d) The recruitment problem is one which already exists and will be accentuated if present trends are allowed to continue unchecked. The proposals for a junior qualification are specifically designed to ease the problem by extending the field of recruitment to those who have educational entry standards marginally lower than those now acceptable and by providing a new source of qualified staff.

(e) Similar supervision must be applied equally rigorously to practising offices.

(e) The Council has no intention of taking away the rights of practitioners who are (or have been) training students unless the scope of their practice has become clearly unsuitable for such purposes. However, practitioners who seek to take students for the first time will have to comply with progressively stricter criteria – this might reduce in course of time the number of places available for candidates and emphasizes the need to permit training to take place wherever proper facilities exist whether they are in practice, in industry, in commerce or in the public service.

(f) It might prove difficult for the Institute to supervise training on the scale envisaged.

(f) The Council recognizes the problems but holds the view that they must be overcome if the objective of raising standards is to be achieved.

(4) Public practice

(a) Training in industry, commerce or the public service followed by 30 months' appropriate experience will not confer upon future practitioners the qualities which are now expected of chartered accountants in public practice.

(a) (i) For reasons which have already been given, the Council believes that it is not incompatible with the concept of a profession for training to take place in industry, commerce or the public service. It recognizes, however, that the challenges which face a member in public practice sometimes differ in context from those faced by members in other occupations. For this reason, one of the proposals in the scheme is that, to perform reserved functions, a member must first obtain '30 months' appropriate experience'. This experience can be obtained just as satisfactorily after qualification as before because independence and objectivity are not qualities which can be tested by examination.

(ii) On the question of the period of 30 months, this is all that most graduates obtain under the present regulations and a qualified member is regarded as being equivalent to a graduate for this purpose.

(iii) Furthermore, the Council does not anticipate that any significant number of accountants trained in industry, commerce or the public service will fail to take advantage of the particular expertise they have acquired and seek to become auditors or to perform analogous functions. It is thought that they might well obtain the required 30 months' appropriate experience in order that the firm name can be used in the performance of reserved functions but that their main contribution to the partnership is likely to be in connection with the provision of management services and advice. Some, no doubt, will be concerned with the audit role to which they will bring their experience of sophisticated computer techniques which few of the Institute's students now have an opportunity to acquire.

(b) Is it necessary to retain, in certain circumstances, the descriptions 'incorporated' and 'certified' accountant? It would appear that there will remain some discrimination as regards former members of The Society of Incorporated Accountants.

(b) The retention of the descriptions 'incorporated' and 'certified' is thought to be essential to maintain the principle that no person can perform reserved functions under the description 'chartered accountant' unless he has obtained 30 months' appropriate experience. It is the belief of the Council that the number of members who will be required to readopt their former description under this provision will be negligible. On the other hand, there will be no distinctive symbol in the List of Members to indicate which members have been admitted as a result of integration – in consequence, the use of the symbol 'S' to indicate former membership of The Society of Incorporated Accountants will be discontinued.

(c) Under the scheme, a member who has been trained in industry, commerce or the public service can practise with limited rights and describe himself as a chartered accountant without having first obtained 30 months' appropriate experience. This will add to, rather than reduce, confusion in the public mind.

K. R. TINGLEY

The taxation of capital gains is now an established feature of the tax code in the United Kingdom. Short-term gains accruing to individuals, trustees and others will be assessed under Case VII of Schedule D but long-term chargeable gains are assessable to Capital Gains Tax or, where derived by companies, to Corporation Tax.

The law and practice of capital gains taxation is fully dealt with by this work which incorporates a text of seven hundred and eighty-five pages. The text is liberally illustrated by nearly five hundred examples and states the law in force on January 1st, 1969. A comprehensive index facilitates easy reference.

This work is indispensable to practitioners, students, investors and others who are concerned with the interpretation and application of this most difficult branch of taxation.

(c) The Council accepts this point but holds the view that it is unavoidable if it is accepted:

(i) that the best training and experience for management consultancy functions can be obtained in industry and commerce; and

(ii) that it will be impracticable to prevent some members, trained and employed in industry or commerce, from engaging in part-time practice of a limited nature; such members cannot be regarded as less competent than members holding the junior qualification in relation to the provision of limited accountancy services.

(d) Does this prejudice the position of an existing chartered accountant who is engaged in industry at the date of integration?

(d) Not in any way. Every existing chartered accountant who has qualified after service in a practitioner's office must, thereby, have obtained 30 months' appropriate experience and be entitled to an unrestricted practising certificate.

(5) Future structure of the Institute

(a) An increase in the non-practitioner membership might operate to the disadvantage of the practitioner. There is an inherent danger of whatever safeguards are to be incorporated in the Royal Charter being amended by a majority of two-thirds of the members voting on a resolution at some future date.

(a) It is the Council's view that maintenance of the independence of the practitioner is a matter of paramount concern to all members whatever their occupation. There is unlikely to be any danger of the independence of the practitioner becoming eroded as a result of action by the non-practitioner membership. Already the practitioner membership of the Institute is in the minority and no problems have arisen. The Council recognizes that if the training proposals are approved, the description chartered accountant will have a different connotation. Nevertheless, a chartered accountant with an unrestricted practising certificate will have been trained (or will have obtained post-qualification experience) in the same way and at least to the same high standard as obtains today.

(b) The number of members holding the junior qualification may increase to the extent that ultimately they will be in a position to dictate policy.

(b) It is for the Institute to conduct its affairs properly and provide the services and facilities which are required by members holding the junior qualification so that the proposed arrangements whereby the direction of policy is the responsibility of the chartered accountant membership remain tenable.

(6) Integration with the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA

(a) Integration with the members of the non-chartered bodies would mean dilution.

(a) It is a fundamental objective of the scheme to raise professional standards. This can be achieved only by taking advantage, under proper safeguards, of all available facilities for training students. These facilities exist in industry, commerce and the public service and the safeguards involve the extension of the present system of service under articles into these fields. However, it is inconceivable that either industrial, commercial and public service organizations or future candidates will willingly accept the burdens which are to be imposed by service under 'training contracts' if alternative and easier methods of obtaining a professional accountancy qualification are to remain available. Already the position has been reached that the ACCA, the ICWA and the IMTA, which together total less than half the membership of the Institute, are recruiting annually more candidates with at least two 'A' levels (or the equivalent) than the Institute – this is a clear indication of the attitude of students. Therefore to extend the present system of service under articles makes it essential to integrate with the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA. Members are being asked to accept that what they regard as 'dilution' caused by the extension of the description 'chartered accountant' to others who have been trained in different ways in the past will be greatly outweighed by the long-term advantages of increased strength and improved standards which will accrue to the profession as a whole.

(b) Whilst the IMTA is a body of high standing and reputation, the functions performed by its members in general are highly specialized and remote from the normal work of members of the Institute.

(b) There is a substantial degree of 'overlap' in the functions performed by members of the IMTA and those performed by members of the Institute and of the ACCA and ICWA. Chartered municipal treasurers are often required to carry out the audits of companies providing services and of municipal undertakings of a trading nature; they are to be found in nationalized industries carrying out management accounting functions. Although in their work they might have to satisfy different legislative requirements, the accounting functions they perform are little different from those of members of the other participating bodies.

(c) The benefits of an additional qualification (or qualifications) will be lost to those members who are also members of one or more of the integrating bodies.

(c) It is the view of the Council that no member will suffer serious disadvantage either because members of other bodies share his description and designatory letters or because an additional description and designatory letters which he has acquired are eliminated. It is upon a person's basic training and subsequent experience and upon his personality, competence and ability that he is judged; not upon a qualification (or qualifications) which can only indicate attainment of a certain minimum standard on a specific date in the past. No change in description can take away from a person that which he has, nor can it give to a person that which he has not.

(7) Integration with the Scottish and Irish Institutes

Integration of the three Institutes of Chartered Accountants should precede or at least take place at the same time as integration of the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA.

(i) The Council believes that different considerations are involved. The English, Scottish and Irish Institutes are bodies which, fundamentally, have a similar viewpoint (and will continue to have a similar viewpoint in the future). The methods of training are (and will continue to be) substantially similar and, accordingly, the continued separate existence of these three bodies will not adversely affect the viability of the proposed training arrangements in industry, commerce or the public service. On the other hand, in the present climate of national aspirations, there is little likelihood of the members of the Scottish or Irish Institutes agreeing to a surrender of their independence. Moreover there are substantial constitutional problems to be overcome in the case of the Irish Institute which has to obtain the approval of two governments to any changes in its constitution.

(ii) Whilst the Council recognizes that complete integration and the establishment of one premier body for the whole of Great Britain and Ireland might be a desirable aim, it believes it to be impracticable at the present time. The need for integration of the members of the ACCA, ICWA and IMTA into the three separate Institutes in England and Wales, of Scotland and in Ireland is, however, a matter of some urgency and can only present greater problems the longer it is delayed.

(8) Federation

A federal structure based upon the existence of separate functional accountancy bodies but with a co-ordinating Council might be preferable to integration.

(a) It is the view of the Council that a federal arrangement is undesirable for the following reasons:

(i) it is contrary to the fundamental concept of one profession;

(ii) it is not possible to raise standards if separate autonomous bodies are in competition for recruits;

(iii) it would complicate the position of an accountant who changes his occupation. If membership of an accountancy body depends upon the original stream of training, it would not be possible to bring into partnership a person trained in industry and continue to describe the resulting firm as 'chartered accountants'. If, on the other hand, membership of an accountancy body depends upon a person's current occupation, the increasing tendency for members to move into industry and back into practice would result in internal transfers within the profession which would further confuse the public;

(iv) any federal structure of separate autonomous bodies will, sooner or later, fragment as a result of a difference of opinion unless the co-ordinating Council has statutory authority.

(b) The proposals in the scheme recognize the difficulties which may arise from differences in points of view. The 'stream' committees of the Council will be cross fertilized. The functional committees of the Council will be fully integrated. Differences of opinion arising from different viewpoints will be resolved, as they are now, at the committee rather than the Council level. This arrangement will enable the Council to discharge its considerable volume of business with reasonable expedition. Similar problems will not arise under the proposals for joint committees to be established with the Scottish and Irish Institutes because any differences of opinion are unlikely to stem from fundamental differences of viewpoint.

(9) A junior qualification

(a) There is widespread dislike of the proposed description and designatory letters 'Licentiate Accountant' and 'Lic.A.'.

(a) The Council will give further consideration to a description and designatory letters for the proposed junior qualification.

(b) Holders of the junior qualification should not have any practice rights. It is inconsistent, on the one hand to claim to raise standards and, on the other hand, to introduce a junior qualification of a lower standard for persons who will do much of the work which is done by many small practitioners (some of whom are not much concerned with services covered by the definition of 'reserved functions').

(b) The Council considers that it is wrong to confer upon members a junior qualification which is specifically designed to indicate the attainment of a recognized level of technical competence and craftsmanship and then to deny them the right to exercise their craft bearing in mind that any member of the public can provide general accountancy services irrespective of competence to do so. The reservation of certain functions to chartered accountant members with 'appropriate experience' is a limitation on the rights of members which is designed solely to protect the public interest. If limitations are to be applied to the exercise of a craft, it will be interpreted by the public as a restrictive practice designed solely to protect the selfish interests of members.

(c) On the other hand, the proposed junior qualification might not prove to be sufficiently attractive partly because it will be regarded as a 'second class' qualification and partly because the method of progression from the junior to the senior qualification is too onerous.

(c) (i) The very large number of students registered with the ACCA and ICWA is some indication of the desire for an accountancy qualification. The present qualifications are clearly beyond the reach of most of these students and the Council believes that the establishment of a junior qualification will meet a need. Otherwise, the raising of educational entry standards would deny to some potential candidates the opportunity of obtaining an accountancy qualification.

(ii) The Council considers that the junior qualification and the registered student candidates for it will help to meet the needs of many practising offices which are experiencing great difficulty in recruiting staff. It is considered that recruitment to such practices will become more attractive under the scheme because of the opportunities it will offer for the attainment of a meaningful qualification coupled with the availability of a ladder for progression to the higher qualification.

(iii) It is the Council's view that the junior qualification will become widely sought and respected. Some candidates will seek this qualification because they wish to specialize from the outset in a limited field. They will be able to reach high levels of expertise (and remuneration) in their chosen specialism. The qualification should meet the needs of those who specialize as, for example, computer programmers or systems analysts.

(10) Organization and administration

(a) A Council of 90 is too large for the speedy and efficient discharge of business.

(a) The Council in full meeting will not be concerned with matters of detail which will be resolved in committee. The function of the Council will be to bring a wide range of experience to bear upon matters of policy. Experience shows that the Council in full meeting quickly becomes aware if a course of action is unacceptable for any reason and, if so, the matter is remitted back to the committee (or to other committees) for further consideration on points of difficulty. A large Council will reduce the burden of work on individual members who form the basis of all standing committees whose function it will be to do the detailed work.

(b) There will be problems of communication between the Council and a membership of over 80,000.

(b) The Council recognizes the problem but it is one which already exists. With increased subscription revenue from a substantially larger membership it will be easier to strengthen the district society and branch organization with permanent staff and to devolve much of the work which is now done by the Institute. Development on these lines should go some way towards solving the problem.

(11) Other accountancy bodies

Conflicting views were expressed about the possibility of extending the proposals to the three other bodies on the lines set out in the addendum to the scheme which was published in the Newsletter for September 1968. The view was expressed that supporting legislation to prohibit, without sanction by the Board of Trade, the formation of new accountancy bodies should be a prerequisite to any extension of the scheme.

The Council believes that it will strengthen the position of the Institute if at least the practising side of the profession has been rationalized before an approach is made to the Government for legislation. It is not possible to make this approach until after the Monopolies Commission has made its report about practices in the professions which may be thought to be restrictive. The Council considers that it will not be to the advantage of the profession to delay action on the scheme until this report is made. In addition the viability of the junior qualification is questionable if other established qualifications are to continue to be available.

(12) Overseas matters

The sacrifices of many young overseas members will have been made in vain if membership of the Institute on equal terms if given to locally qualified members of other bodies.

A member who has qualified as a result of training obtained in Great Britain or Ireland can never lose the additional benefits he has gained.

Current Law

Companies: Life Directors

THE appellant and his wife were the first directors of a private company and were appointed permanent life directors by article 11 of the articles of association. Article 16 (H) provided that 'the permanent life directors shall have power to terminate forthwith the directorship of any of the ordinary directors by notice in writing'. The appellant's wife died in 1962.

On the question whether or not the power conferred by article 16 (H) was only exercisable during the joint lives of the appellant and his wife and ceased to be exercisable on her death, the House of Lords held that the power was not vested in the permanent life directors as recipients of a joint confidence but for the securing of their joint interests, and the principle that a bare power could not be exercised by the survivor of joint holders did not apply; that the principle that a power annexed to an office passed to the successive holders of the office was not conclusive since the office in question died with the death of the survivor of the two occupants of the power; that on the true construction of the articles the power conferred by article 16 (H) remained exercisable by the appellant after the death of his wife.

Bersel Manufacturing Co Ltd and Another v. Berry ([1968] 2 All E.R. 552).

Companies: Misfeasance

ON April 27th, 1959, a company passed resolutions for a creditors' voluntary winding-up and a liquidator was appointed. The liquidator's report at the commencement of the liquidation showed estimated assets of £9,115, secured creditors of £2,228 and unsecured creditors of £28,525. The assets realized only £1,288 7*s* 6*d*, and the expenses incurred by the liquidator amounted to £1,215 7*s* 3*d* including a sum of £200 paid to a former solicitor engaged by the committee of creditors to arrange the calling of the meetings to wind up the company. It was accepted that, apart from any question of the amount of the charge, this sum was not payable out of the assets of the company. It was admitted that the liquidator had been dilatory.

On a petition by the Official Receiver presented under section 224 (2) of the Companies Act 1948 for the compulsory winding-up of the company, Pennycuick, J., held that the Court had jurisdiction under section 224 (2) if it was satisfied on a balance of probabilities that the voluntary winding-up could not be continued with due regard to the interests of the creditors, but that since the winding-up was almost complete and on the liquidator's undertakings to refund the sum of £200 and to complete the liquidation with all due dispatch, the burden of showing that the liquidation could not be continued with due regard to the interests of creditors was not discharged and the petition would be dismissed.

Re J. Russell Electronics Ltd ([1968] 2 All E.R. 559).

Companies: Disputed Debt

THE plaintiffs and the first defendant and his wife were equal shareholders in two companies, J Ltd and C Ltd. The first defendant presented a creditor's petition to wind up J Ltd based on an alleged debt of £1,869 odd for director's fees. The debt was disputed on the ground of the first defendant's drawings from J Ltd without deduction of income tax. There was no authority for the drawings other than the voting of the director's fees. The second dependant presented a petition to wind up C Ltd based on an alleged debt of £347 for goods supplied. The debt was disputed on the ground that it was owed by C M Ltd, a subsidiary of C Ltd which originally carried on business at the same premises.

In an action to restrain the prosecution of the winding-up petitions, Ungoed-Thomas, J., held, granting the injunctions, that since the debt upon which each winding-up petition was founded was substantially disputed, the petitioner was not established as a creditor and thus had no locus standi to present a petition.

Mann and Another v. Goldstein and Another ([1968] 2 All E.R. 769).

Companies: Gift of Shares

IN 1948 W caused a transfer of 350 shares owned by him in a company to be made to J, his stepson, whom he had treated on the same footing as his own sons. The transfer bore a signature which purported to be that of J. The Court accepted J's evidence that he did not execute the transfer. By article 8 of the company's articles of association a transfer of shares had to be signed by both transferor and transferee; and by section 75 of the Companies Act 1948 it was not lawful to register a transfer unless a proper instrument of transfer were delivered to the company. J's name was entered in the register of members as the holder of 350 shares and certificates for the 350 shares were issued to J signed by W.

In 1954 W, having fallen out with J, caused a transfer of 300 shares to be made to himself appearing to bear J's signature. The register of members was altered accordingly. W alleged that in 1956 J had transferred 50 shares to him. In 1964 an order was made for the compulsory winding-up of the company. In 1965 the liquidator informed J of the above matters and asked whether he claimed to be a shareholder. J replied in the negative. Subsequently, J, in reply to a question put to him by a half-brother at W's request, stated that he had no shares, wanted no shares, and, if any were to come to him from W, he, J, would not take it. J now sought an order that his name should be included in the list of contributories as the holder of 350 shares.

The Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of Pennycuick, J., held that there had been the necessary relationship between W and J to give rise to the presumption of advancement and on this ground, as well as on the evidence, an intention on the part of W to make a gift of the 350 shares was established; that the phrase 'proper instrument' in section 75 meant an instrument such as would attract stamp duty, not an instrument complying with the articles; and in the circumstances the fact that J had not signed the 1948 transfer amounted only to an irregularity, and W had made an effective gift; but that J, by his message to W, had effectively disclaimed the gift of the 350 shares.

After hearing further argument on the question of disclaimer the Court of Appeal held that disclaimer operated by way of avoidance and not of disposition and did not, therefore, need to be evidenced in writing under section 53 (2) of the Law of Property Act 1925; that it was not necessary that the share register should have been altered for a disclaimer in respect of the 50 shares to have been effective, for gift and disclaimer were concerned only with beneficial interests, and, if a gift was avoided by disclaimer, the register was rectifiable as of right without the execution of any transfer; and that a disclaimer of a gift inter vivos could not be withdrawn.

Wills: Acknowledgement before Attesting Witnesses

THE testator invited two of a group of four persons in his house 'to witness my will', indicating as he did so a folded document in his pocket but without withdrawing it. It was accepted that he had himself already signed it. He then retired to another room with one of the proposed witnesses, and unfolded the document to reveal his own signature; the witness then signed, and returned to the group whilst the second witness in turn retired and added his signature.

Section 9 of the Wills Act 1837 requires a will to be acknowledged by the testator in the presence of both witnesses, who must also have the opportunity of seeing the testator's signature at the time of acknowledgement. In the present case, the only purported 'acknowledgement' before both witnesses was in the gesture towards his pocket, at which time neither had seen or been able to see the document. The subsequent acknowledgement of his signature to each witness privately in turn did not satisfy the Act and the will therefore failed.

In re Groffman (The Times, December 19th, 1968) (following Blake v. Blake (1882) 7 P.D. 102).

Contract: intent to establish legal relations. A family arrangement under which a parent undertook to provide a house for the child, in consideration of the child returning from abroad and pursuing a stipulated course of study, was not intended to be legally binding. The parent was therefore entitled to possession of the house. (Jones v. Padavatton (1968) 112 S.J. 965, C.A.: following Balfour v. Balfour [1919] 2 K.B. 571.)

Executorship: joint will [Canada]. Husband and wife executed a joint will of 'all property of which we may be possessed . . . at the time of decease of either of us.' The surviving husband received certain benefits under the joint will, and subsequently executed a further will purporting to dispose of his estate in a different manner. Held, on his death, the joint will validly disposed of those assets of the husband's estate acquired by him before the death of his wife. Vertical record

THIS column in The Accountant of February 22nd worked itself into quite a turmoil on the subject of left to right versus right to left in ten-year records in company reports. It was probably inevitable, therefore, that a further variation would soon crop up and something different was duly found in the report of Ross Group Ltd, from which this week's reprint comes.

In the Ross Group report the ten-year summary is neither presented right to left nor left to right – but up and down, or is it down and up? It is presented with horizontal headings – group profit before tax, taxation, group profit after tax, net dividends paid, depreciation, fixed assets, net worth and turnover – and vertical figures beginning with 1968 and leading down to 1959.

Whatever one may expect to come first in horizontal presentation of figures (latest figures next to the narrative or furthest away from it) there is no doubt that with vertical figures it is logical to have the latest figures at the top of the column and the oldest figures at the bottom. What this proves, this column does not even begin to pretend to know, but the vertical summary in the Ross Group accounts is certainly easily readable.

Partial fall

The second part of the summary, incidentally, is headed 'Ordinary Share Capital' and is a ten-year history of the Ross Group equity. The columns are horizontally headed: total at beginning of year, issued as bonus, issued as fully paid, issued for cash, issue price, proceeds, total at year-end. The final two columns are dividend rate per cent and adjusted rate per cent, the adjustment being made back to 1959 in terms of current capital.

The ten-year summary process in Ross Group shows, through a combined look at the trading results and the share capital build up, the rise and partial fall of a company

AUDITORS' REPORT to the members of Ross Group Limited

We have examined the balance sheet, consolidated balance sheet and consolidated profit and loss account on pages 11 to 18. The accounts of certain subsidiary companies have been audited by other firms. In our opinion the balance sheet and the consolidated accounts comply with the Companies Acts 1948 and 1967 and give respectively a true and fair view of the state of the Company's affairs at 30th September, 1968 and so far as concerns members of the Company, a true and fair view of the state of affairs and of the profit of the Group.

PEAT, MARWICK, MITCHELL & CO.
Chartered Accountants, Joint Auditors which began in trawling and rose through take-overs and internal development to be a power in frozen foods, poultry, fish, transport and quite a few other things besides.

Problems in the trawling industry, an over-reaching expansion programme elsewhere and, more particularly, some costly and unprofitable overseas ventures caused trouble. In 1959 equity capital was £625,000, turnover £13 million and pre-tax profit £323,000. At the peak in 1966, equity capital was £14·3 million, turnover in terms of outside sales £85 million and pre-tax profits £3·3 million. In the following year – although turnover was £94 million – profit had fallen to £2·02 million. However, profit recovered to close on £2·63 million in the year under review, from maintained turnover.

Sales

In the interim there have been considerable changes in management, a change in chairmanship and much selling off. The new chairman, Mr A. S. Alexander, in his first statement, reports that in the year under review over £2 million was raised through the sale of major parts of the chemical, motor, agricultural machinery and grocery shop interests as well as of a merchanting business in Australia. Since the end of the financial year there have been further sales – an Australian fishing business, a shipyard at Selby and four small catering businesses – and these have released further funds of some £1·1 million. The funds are being reinvested in the group's main food divisions.

Overseas interests, Mr Alexander says, have occupied a great deal of the attention of the board. In an interim statement last June it was foreshadowed that increased special provisions against exceptional overseas losses would be necessary. The extent of the provision needed proved higher than the amount contemplated in June and a further £1·7 million has been charged against reserve in the 1967–68 accounts in addition to the £1 million provided in the previous year, but these interests are not expected to be a further drain on the group's resources.

Overseas

Ross Group's operations overseas were in the Middle East and in Newfoundland where a trading and fish freezing operation, begun with local partners and the Provincial Government in 1967, has been suspended in order to minimize the losses that were being sustained. The present position is that trawlers, sent out from the UK, have been brought home and, because of the extremely severe recession in the Newfoundland fishing industry, the frozen fish plant is still unsold.

In the Middle East, Ross operated an extensive shrimp fishing operation in Saudi Arabian, Iranian and Bahrainian waters. Losses in the first two areas have been severe but the reserve provisions made are expected to cover capital and other losses. With these expensive operations very much drawn down, and in some cases stopped altogether, and with the UK operations shorn of some of the fringe diversifications, the group is now in a much stronger position.

On the UK trawling side there are discussions with other companies in the industry and the Industrial Reorganization Corporation on the possibility of forming a new company to which various trawling interests would be transferred. The Ross Group view is that this would be more profitable than the individual fleets operating on their own. But there is no indication as yet of the final outcome of the discussions.

CITY NOTES

FROM indirect pressure from the French franc, London financial markets have come under pressure from home-produced tension. The bad February trade figures, showing a deficit of £62 million – an increase of as much as £50 million on January and the worst position since last October – rattled the City.

The trade figures were sandwiched between a Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin, which had done something more than fully endorse the Government's policy of the tightest possible control on credit and on consumer spending, and the decision of the building societies to raise interest rates virtually by a full point.

The Bank of England's main point on spending and credit curbs was not necessarily that they must be kept at their present pitch to contain the current balance of payments situation, but that they may well have to be intensified still further if room in the economy is to be made for a desirable level of industrial capital investment. The Bank cannot see the present level of private spending plus a desirable level of capital spending leading anywhere else but to balance of payments penury.

Naturally enough under such circumstances, any lingering Budget 'hopes' have given way to deep Budget doubts and it is fair reasoning to suggest, as some do, that a Chancellor who thought he had 'overkilled' last year, but found he had barely wounded, will be very much inclined to make sure of overkill this year.

* * * *

NEW issue underwriters who have had things very much their own way for some considerable time have found the market going very much against them lately. Convertible loan stocks, particularly low coupon high convertibility rating issues, have not been money pullers and underwriters have been left with large lines of stock. Latterly, new equity offers have lagged. The substantial Bardolin equity operation was two-thirds left with underwriters and some other minor issues have fared badly as well. In contrast, Westminster Bank's offer by tender of shares in the Rentokil company was heavily oversubscribed with the striking price 5*s* above a minimum tender level of 20*s*. With banking pressure leading to considerable industrial funding of bank borrowings, underwriters may be at the wrong end of the market for some time yet.

IN recommending an increase to 5 per cent net in the investment rate and 8½ per cent in the loan rate, the Building Societies Association has, as usual, left it to individual societies to suit action to the recommendation. There has been talk of late of two-tier building society rates, whereby new money, attracted at the higher investment rate, will service new lending at the higher rate and existing borrowers will be protected and will not have their interest rate raised.

Without the introduction of a scheme on such lines the building societies will have to demand higher monthly payments from existing borrowers rather than grant extensions of the mortgage. At an 8½ per cent interest rate level there will probably be many thousands of outstanding loans on which maintenance of monthly payments will not even cover interest on loans, let alone any repayment of capital.

THE British Petroleum company which very often has sat in the shadow of Shell has certainly come into the light with its Alaskan oil discovery and the Atlantic-Richfield deal taking BP into the petrol pump market on the rich United States eastern seaboard. That the group plans to raise the equivalent of £62·5 million to finance part of the Alaskan project, however, has been something more than a gentle reminder to the stock-market followers of BP shares that oil found in Alaska is a long way from the right side of the profit and loss account. The stock-market is a wonderful place for discounting the results of years of development in the space of two weeks.

Capital Gains Tax

SIR, – A point of interest has arisen in the recent take-over offer for the shares of the Dutch investment company, Interunie. Shareholders are offered an exchange of shares into either Robeco or Rolinco or Utilico. The offer document states 'It is anticipated that acceptance of the offer will constitute a disposal of Interunie shares which may result in liability to UK capital gains tax'.

Hitherto one had accepted that 'the mere exchange of one holding of shares or securities for another is not a disposal requiring the computation of a gain' (Institute booklet The Taxation of Capital Gains, page 73, paragraph 163 (a)). However, this is not sufficient. It is necessary to inquire into eventual control as a result of an offer, see Finance Act 1965, Schedule 7, paragraph 6 (2).

Thus, shareholders of Interunie who accept, say, the Robeco offer, do so not knowing whether Robeco will gain control and thus presumably not knowing whether a capital gains tax liability will ensue.

Have any of your readers similar experiences?

Yours truly,

Harrow, Middlesex. A. M. MYERS.

Integration of the Profession

SIR, – In the latest Institute Newsletter it was announced that 'the normal procedure will be followed' of taking the poll before the Future Plans meeting on April 17th. A report is being sent with the notices to all members setting out some of the points for and against the proposals raised at the meetings in the districts.

At the last annual meeting of the Institute this procedure was used. As a result the proxy votes of those who did not attend and had not heard the debates, effectively reversed decisions taken by the members present and voting in person. At the special 'Chartac' meeting in August 1968 the procedure was reversed. The President then said, 'It is, in the opinion of the Council, essential that every member should have an opportunity to express his support for, or his opposition to, the resolution and be able to decide how to cast his vote in the light of the arguments which will be advanced this afternoon. It is for this reason that a transcript of the proceedings and a proxy card will be sent to each member as soon as possible after the meeting'.

Does this reason not apply with equal force to the subject of Future Plans, the most important issue ever to come before our members? It seems probable that a large majority of the members were unable to attend the special meetings up and down the country. They will have to vote on the basis of a document prepared by the Council (which is committed to the proposals) setting out its own views on the points raised at the district meetings. If the Scottish Institute's report of its meetings (The Accountant, March 1st), is anything to go by, members will get a one-sided view of the merits of the case.

It is possible that the special meeting on April 17th could be a mere formality if the proxy voting turns out to be heavily for or against the proposals. Is this what the Council want? I cannot believe it is. I hope they will reconsider the position and will decide to follow the precedent of the 'Chartac' meeting.

Yours faithfully,

BRUCE W. SUTHERLAND, F.C.A.

Shipston-on-Stour, Warwickshire.

SIR, – At a recent meeting attended by the Vice-President of the English Institute the subject of integration inevitably came up for discussion and an eminent chartered accountant in industry remarked 'Thank God the special position of the auditor is being maintained'. I find nothing in the scheme to justify this pious hope.

Proposal 29 states: 'That the Council should be charged under the Royal Charter to safeguard professional independence'.

The booklet issued by the ICWA helpfully broke down the membership on January 1st, 1968.

	Members in practice	Members not in practice	Total members
English Institute ..	20,000	23,742	43,742
Scottish Institute ..	2,750	5,274	8,024
Irish Institute ..	900	1,177	2,077
ICWA	320	9,531	9,851
ACCA	4,020	7,980	12,000
IMTA	—	4,720	4,720
	27,990	52,424	80,414

We are continually being urged by the supporters of the scheme to look to the longer-term benefits of the proposals. Integration means that the destiny of the Institute can soon be controlled by a preponderance of members who have probably never had any reason to consider the problems of professional independence. In the longer term this position will be exacerbated as in an integrated Institute the new members in industry will overwhelmingly outnumber the new members in practice.

The answer to this is, apparently, to look to the past, which in every other respect supporters of the scheme insist is no criterion for the future. We are told that inertia or an over-preoccupation with management problems, or a combination of both, makes it very difficult at the present time to find sufficient members in industry willing to accept nomination as Council members or to take an active part in conducting the affairs of the Institute. No one can really be surprised at this, as it is only since the 1950's that the Institute has actively endeavoured to consider the ways in which it can be of help to members in industry.

The ACCA, the ICWA and the IMTA have competent and active governing bodies of their own. I see no reason why the mantle of inertia should suddenly descend on them or their 26,500 members so that they, too, decide to leave to practising members virtually the whole conduct of the affairs of the enlarged Institute.

It may be suggested that even if integration does not take place, an increasing proportion of chartered accountants will be occupying positions in industry. I fully support the conception of an Industrial Member's Committee to ensure that the Institute does all it can to provide the best possible service to members in industry. However, it is reasonable to suppose that such members, with their background training will understand the vital importance to both 'sides' of the profession of the continued independence of the auditor. Without this understanding, which I submit would largely disappear if the present proposals succeed, I believe that proposal 29 is meaningless.

Report of the Council

Extracts from the Report of the Council to be presented to the annual general meeting of the members of the Institute on March 28th.

Accounts and balance sheet

AS expected, expenditure has continued to rise. The increase has, however, been fully met by higher income and the Council is pleased to report a modest surplus in the income and expenditure account for 1968. Part of this increased income arose from the admission fees of the abnormally higher number of new applicants for membership of the Institute: the income from this source may well not remain at this level in the future. In 1968, heavy expenditure continued to be incurred in connection with the proposals regarding the future of the accountancy profession.

In the early part of the year the Finance and General Purposes Committee received the report of the management consultants who were commissioned to survey and report on the administration of the Institute. The report stated that the expenditure of the Institute was reasonable in relation to the services provided but suggested some changes of policy with a view to keeping down costs. During the year the Finance and General Purposes Committee has been engaged in reviewing the administration of the Institute and the consultants' report was of considerable assistance in this matter. A number of alterations in the organization and administration have now been made and these steps are helping to contain increases in expenditure.

Every effort is being made to limit the rise in costs, arising from continued inflation, which will occur in 1969 but the Council feels that it will be necessary to increase subscriptions in 1970 to limit the probable deficit in that year. It has therefore decided that proposals for increased subscriptions shall be placed before the members at the annual general meeting on March 28th, 1969.

Proposals for the future of the accountancy profession in Great Britain and Ireland

On July 25th, 1968, there was issued to members under cover of a letter from the President a document entitled 'Proposals for the Future of the Accountancy Profession in Great Britain and Ireland as affecting The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland'.

On September 20th, 1968, there was sent to members further documentation which summarized the attitudes of the Councils of the other five participating accountancy bodies towards the integration proposals. It will be recalled that the participating bodies, in addition to the Institute, are The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants and The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants: under the proposals members of the three last-mentioned bodies would be able to elect which of the three Institutes of Chartered Accountants they would join.

Between September 26th and November 28th, 1968, fifteen meetings of members of the Institute were held at various centres throughout Great Britain. A report of these meetings appeared in The Accountant's Magazine for February 1969 at page 67 et seq. [and in The Accountant of March 1st].

Additional meetings at various centres overseas were held for members of the three Institutes of Chartered Accountants: those in Montreal, Toronto and Bermuda were conducted by the President of the Scottish Institute, while those in Europe, Africa, and the Far East were conducted by senior members of the English Institute.

Steps have also been taken to acquaint CA Students' Societies in Scotland with the proposals.

In a letter dated January 15th, 1969, sent to members of the Institute with the January issue of The Accountant's Magazine, the President said:

> 'The Council has considered reports of the meetings which have been held in the United Kingdom and is much encouraged by the measure of support for the scheme which has been shown. Accordingly, the Council has now decided to submit the integration proposals to the members in special general meeting for approval in principle. This meeting will probably be held in April 1969.'

Arrangements are in train to hold the special general meeting accordingly at the McLellan Galleries, Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, during the forenoon of Friday, April 25th, 1969.

On February 3rd, 1969, a joint announcement by the six participating bodies indicated the intention of them all to proceed on similar lines as regards submitting the integration proposals for approval in principle.

Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services

As foreshadowed in last year's report, a number of changes were made to the diploma scheme during 1968. At the same time the examinations for the Certificate in Management Information (sponsored by The Institutes of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, and in Ireland) were merged with those for Part I of the Joint Diploma.

In view of speculation as to how the proposals for the future of the accountancy profession might affect the future of the Joint Diploma the Presidents of the five bodies participating in the diploma scheme issued the following statement in January 1969:

> 'Whether or not the present scheme for the development of the accountancy profession is implemented, we reiterate that the Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services has the full support of the respective Councils of the participating bodies.
> 'We urge members, whether engaged in public practice, consultancy, industry, commerce or the public service, to give the joint diploma their full support in every way.'

During the last year the Joint Diploma Board continued its programme of visits to area centres and industrial organizations to explain the scheme and seek members' views.

International study groups

The American/Canadian/British Study Group (now called 'The Accountants' International Study Group') has continued work throughout the year on two projects which are expected to produce papers during 1969. The Dutch/British Study Group has also continued work, and the topic which is mainly interesting it at the present time is a comparative study of the means by which individuals may qualify as accountants in the four countries represented on the Study Group. Sir William Slimmings has continued to represent the Scottish Institute in both these activities throughout the year.

Taxation

During 1968–69 co-operation continued with the other constituent bodies of the Accountants' Joint Parliamentary Committee (The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants).

A joint memorandum on the Finance Bill 1968 was submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in May 1968 and representatives of the accountancy bodies subsequently met officials of the Board of Inland Revenue to discuss the memorandum.

In the autumn of 1968, at the invitation of the English Institute, the Scottish Institute participated with the other accountancy bodies in preparing, at the request of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a special Joint Memorandum of Proposals for the Simplification of the Taxation System. It was not possible in the time allotted to formulate proposals for radical alterations, but the memorandum, which was submitted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in November 1968 and published in The Accountants' Magazine for December 1968 [and The Accountant of November 16th, 1968], contained a number of suggestions for significant alterations to the taxation system designed to achieve simplification in certain fields. The memorandum has subsequently been discussed by representatives of the accountancy bodies with officials of the Inland Revenue, who have signified their appreciation of some of the difficulties facing accountants under existing legislation. Pressure is to be maintained on the Government by the accountancy bodies in an endeavour to have action taken to implement the proposals in future legislation.

The member bodies of the Accountants' Joint Parliamentary Committee submitted also in November 1968 a Joint Memorandum on Anomalies and Practical Difficulties arising from recent Finance Acts. This memorandum was published in The Accountant's Magazine for December 1968 [and The Accountant of December 21st, 1968]. In previous years such memoranda have normally been submitted in the January preceding the Finance Bill for that year, but on this occasion the submission was brought forward to November 1968 in order to allow full consideration of the points raised to be given during the drafting of the Finance Bill 1969.

Selective employment tax

The Council has been represented in joint discussions with representatives of the other Accountants' Joint Parliamentary Committee bodies in preparing a memorandum for the consideration of Professor W. B. Reddaway, who is holding an inquiry into selective employment tax. The memorandum was agreed and submitted on behalf of the Councils of the bodies concerned on January 23rd, 1969.

Investment grants

The co-operation between the Institute, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants has continued during the year under review with the aim of making representations from time to time to the Board of Trade on matters connected with the investment grant system. A case book of anomalies has been prepared and will be of value in making future representations in this regard.

Company law

Mention was made in last year's report that the various subcommittees of the Institute's Company Law Committee (now re-named the Parliamentary and Law Committee) were engaged in preparing material for submission to the Board of Trade in connection with the next Companies Bill. Subsequently an invitation was received to join with the other bodies represented on the Accountants' Joint Parliamentary Committee to consider this problem on a co-operative basis. Accordingly representatives were appointed by the Parliamentary and Law Committee to take part in the discussions with representatives of the other accountancy bodies and this activity has continued for most of the year under review. A document has been prepared which is currently under review by the Parliamentary and Law Committee and it is expected that by the time this report comes into members' hands the joint submission will have had the approval of the Councils of the bodies taking part.

Accountants' reports on profit forecasts

At the invitation of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales the Council considered a statement which the English Institute proposed issuing on the subject of the reports required under paragraph 15 of the City Code on Take-overs and Mergers. As a result of joint discussions the English Institute issued a statement in August 1968 with which the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland was associated and to which the panel on take-overs and mergers gave its assent.

Post-qualifying education

During 1968 there was a very considerable expansion in the activities of the Post-qualifying Education Committee, both in the variety and number of courses provided and in the very significant increase in participation by Institute members and others. Ten residential courses and 40 non-residential courses were presented, involving 98 course days. The total number of participants at post-qualifying education courses in 1968 was 1,662, which represents a 70 per cent increase on the enrolments for the corresponding period in 1967.

Research

Institute research

At the date of the last report there were seven uncompleted research projects. Two projects were added, and three completed during the subsequent twelve months.

The three completed projects were: 'Long-term planning as a management tool'; 'The presentation in company accounts of taxation assessed under Schedule F'; and 'Depreciation: its meaning, purpose and accounting treatment'.

The Research and Publications Committee forebore to introduce further additional research projects into the programme during 1968 in order to concentrate on completing those that were in hand, and considerable success has been achieved in this connection. The Committee is now putting in hand a further four projects, with the possibility of adding two more to this during the coming year.

Joint activities with other bodies

The Committee has continued to maintain close contact with its equivalents in Canada, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States and has also had the benefit of exchanging views with The Australian Society of Accountants and the Australian Accountancy Research Foundation. It has been asked, as in previous years, to comment on exposure drafts on various matters prepared by other accountancy bodies and has sought those bodies' advice on some of its own drafts.

The subcommittee of the Research and Publications Committee, which has helped with the translation work in connection with revision of the UEC Lexicon, has continued to function and has kept the Institute's representative on the Commission de Lexicologie Comptable de l'UEC supplied with the material necessary to him for meetings of the Commission. Representatives of the subcommittee have assisted the work of a Franco/German/British subcommittee of the Commission.

The Research and Publications Committee has continued to be represented in joint discussions with the other accountancy bodies in the United Kingdom on the effects of introducing decimal currency in 1971. An extension of this activity has been the setting up of a joint editorial board to provide members of the profession with advice and guidance in connection with the change-over. It is expected that a publication, called Planning Conversion to Decimal Currency, sponsored by the joint board will appear very shortly at 15*s* post free.

Recruitment of apprentices

A new recruitment booklet, Today's Chartered Accountant, was published by the Institute in July 1968 and distributed on a wide basis. The booklet deals with the many and varied careers open to chartered accountants and gives information about entrance requirements, career prospects and salaries. It has been warmly received.

With a view to recruitment, the Institute has also placed a number of advertisements during the year, both in the Press and in publications directed towards university graduates and school-leavers.

In Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen and Dundee standing subcommittees on recruitment, set up by local committees, have maintained and strengthened contacts between the Institute and schools and, where applicable, universities in each area. Careers meetings have been organized either by the Institute itself or by the Youth Employment Service. In considering the numbers of apprentices which they wish to recruit in the autumn of 1969, firms will doubtless have regard to the impact of the staffing of their offices of implementation of the recommendation made by the Special Committee on Education and Training of Apprentices for bringing forward the academic year from the third to the second year of apprenticeship. This means that in 1969–70 both second- and third-year apprentices will be at universities.

Remuneration of apprentices

Certain factors affecting recruitment have to be continually watched. Clearly in this category fall remuneration and the standard of preliminary qualification. As regards the former, the Council advised members of the Institute in a circular in July 1968 of the reasons which had led it to the conclusion that as from September 1st, 1968, the rates of remuneration paid to apprentices in Scotland required to be increased beyond the levels recommended in January 1966: because the 'going rate for the job' varied in some measure from city to city and from area to area in Scotland and having regard to the recommendation put forward by the Special Committee on Education and Training of Apprentices, whose report was published early in 1967, that the practice of recommending rates of remuneration be discontinued, the Council felt it appropriate that any guidance as to the rates of remuneration as from September 1st, 1968, should emanate from local committees rather than from the Council itself. The suggestions made by local committees in Scotland were in general terms for a starting salary for a Scheme C candidate at a rate of some £300–£350 per annum, for increases as each part of the Institute's examination is passed and for a total remuneration over the five-year apprenticeship of about £2,000 where normal progress is made without examination failure.

'City Institutions' Course for London Students

AN interesting and informative insight into the functions of the City was given in a two-day course on 'City Institutions' on Thursday and Friday of last week at Winchester House, held by the Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London.

The course was under the chairmanship of Sir Harold Gillett, Bt, M.C., F.C.A., a former Lord Mayor, who was assisted by Mr Jeffrey Lawson, a member of the Society's Committee. There was an attendance of over 200, including pupils from seven schools from the City and the Greater London area.

In a talk on 'The civic City', by Mr E. H. Nichols, T.D., B.A., LL.B., the Town Clerk, the history of the government of the City and of his own function within the corporation were clearly of interest and benefit to 'potential chartered accountants with orderly minds'. So, too, was a talk on 'The origins of the office of the Chamberlain of London and its financial functions today', by Mr C. R. Whittington, M.A., the City Chamberlain. Miss Suzanne Stanton of the public relations office of the City Corporation spoke on how the City came into being as a trading centre and how its physical changes had developed over the years from the Great Fire in 1666 to the last war blitz. She also dealt with current developments designed to create an environment for the City not only essentially as a commercial centre but also a residential one.

Talks were also given on Lloyd's by Mr W. G. Hayne – a member of Lloyd's for over 40 years; the Hon. R. H. Bonham-Carter on 'Merchant banking', and 'The Stock Exchange', by Mr C. H. Dreyfus.

Bad Debts – A Cost, Not a Loss

Institute of Credit Management's Annual Conference

'BAD debts are random – the provision for bad debts is not a loss, it is a cost', declared Mr A. C. Smith, C.A., at the annual conference of The Institute of Credit Management held last week at the Royal Garden Hotel, London. In his address on 'Budgetary accounts and bad debt provisions' he deprecated the practice of so many people engaged in budgeting who anticipated their debts on the basis of the previous year's experience. As with other charges against the gross profits 'strong fluctuations in trade necessitate a substantial provision which must be a long range calculation'.

In answer to questions, Mr Smith said that budgeting was not a control in itself and that as a tool of management a budget had to be realistic. Although variances had to be watched, so had those departments who always managed to show expenditure up to the limit of the budget figure.

Bad debts and tax

Inevitably the subject of the allowability and disallowability of a bad debt provision for tax purposes was raised, and Mr Smith emphasized he was dealing with budgetary control and not taxation assessments. He admitted that the provision for bad debts for budgetary purposes based on long-term experience could exceed a specific provision for tax purposes in one particular financial year. The converse could well apply, thus indicating that there was no correlation between the two types of provision as they were for two differing purposes; the taxation liability would, of course, be computed in accordance with the bad debts situation during the year under review.

The conference was under the chairmanship of Mr K. R. Cork, F.C.A., and Mr Smith's address was but one dealing with the broad base of subjects appropriate to the knowledge and experience that has to be encompassed by a credit manager. Mr S. E. Wigmore, Assistant Secretary to the Decimal Currency Board, presented a paper on decimal currency entitled 'The "Point" of February 71'. In legislative terms the Decimal Currency Board's function was to facilitate the change-over to decimal currency – practical arrangements and decisions being left to management. In order to assist both management and the man in the street, the Board has published two types of publication. First there is the periodic Newsletter issued every six weeks which has a general approach to the matter; secondly, there is the range of booklets – five of which have so far been published – giving permanent information, and dealing with such matters as expression of amounts, facts and forecasts, new coinage, points for businessmen and cash and cash transactions during the change-over.

On being questioned as to the increase in price levels due to decimalization, Mr Wigmore stated that the trend of price levels had been on the increase in the United Kingdom for a very long time and this trend would not necessarily be exacerbated purely because of decimalization. He further asserted that in New Zealand and Australia public opinion prevented price increases by retailers, and he believed a similar situation would prevail in the United Kingdom.

Bid tactics

A subject which attracted great interest was that of take-over bids which was dealt with by Mr A. R. Beevor, who observed that the terms 'merger' and 'amalgamation' always seemed to give the impression of a more amicable arrangement than that of 'take-over' which had a more sinister import. After explaining what was meant by vertical integration, horizontal integration and diversification, he proceeded to describe the steps that are taken when one company bids for another.

For the purposes of example he used two hypothetical companies which he called A Ltd and B Ltd, when A Ltd was making a bid for B Ltd. Tactics and strategy were essential for each company in order that they might obtain appropriate knowledge of each other as companies, and also of the shareholders comprising them, and the utmost secrecy was essential in the initial stages in order that no leakage of information occurred. This was particularly necessary prior to the meeting of the boards of both companies as so much can influence the market price of shares of each company. An example of the sort of knowledge required was the ownership of large blocks of shares, whether or not there were institutional shareholders, whether there were large holdings by particular families and whether there might be any complications as to trusteeships and beneficiaries in respect of trustee holdings.

Other problems

Mr Beevor stressed that it was not such an easy matter as might be imagined for the board of A Ltd to decide to buy the shares of B Ltd, either on an exchange share basis, or a cash basis, because it might not be to the benefit of B's shareholders. Not only shareholders were involved in a merger or amalgamation but also matters of detail such as the future arrangements for directors and staff. Capital gains tax could well rear its ugly head depending upon the price of B's shares on April 5th, 1965, and this aspect would certainly influence B's acceptance – 'too few acceptances, of course, lapse a bid'. Even where both boards' directors had agreed to the take-over operation, the City Code still had to be complied with before offer documents were sent to the shareholders of B Ltd.

The final address took the form of a comprehensive survey of 'The pattern of consumer credit' by Mr C. McNeil Greig, O.B.E., M.C., General Secretary of The Hire Purchase Trade Association and Council member of The Institute of Credit Management, and the conference concluded with a question session, under the chairmanship of Mr T. Grundy, F.C.A.

Need for Management Consultancy

Institute of Directors' Seminar

LOGICALLY, at a conference having a theme such as 'Should we call in a management consultant?' it would be expected that those attending would be predominantly businessmen from industry and commerce. This was not the case at a one-day seminar with this very theme, organized by the Institute of Directors last week at the Festival Hall, where it was noticeable that a large proportion of delegates were management consultants themselves.

Sir Derek Pritchard – himself an erstwhile consultant, and now chairman of Allied Breweries Ltd – was the chairman of the conference and wittily introduced seven speakers whose papers dealt with such matters as the growth of management consultancy and the tactics and strategy employed by the consultant in dealing with all types of personnel in industry – from machine shop trade union stewards to boards of directors. Four speakers were from large consultancy firms in the UK and one from an American organization; the remaining two speakers put the viewpoint of the large industrial enterprise and the smaller manufacturing company respectively.

Statistics

Some interesting statistics were given by Mr A. F. Frodsham, of the PE Consulting Group Ltd, in his paper 'Management consultancy – now and the next ten years'. He stated that there were about 2,000 consultants within the firms belonging to the Management Consultants Association, with another 200 under training. He pointed out that a total of approximately 3,000 people in member firms of the Association produced an annual income of £15 million.

'Management consultancy has come a long, long way from the 1920s when it was offering a new concept – the ability to set standards of production, cost and performance as a means of control with the emphasis on the shop floor', said Mr C. C. Glover, managing director of Associated Industrial Consultants Ltd, in a paper on 'The consultant's view'. In his opinion consultancy could only be truly successful if both client and consultant worked together to make it so. Management must be ready to criticize but equally ready to take action.

No consultant minds a demanding client, but what Mr Glover thought was far more worrying was the chairman or managing director who would say, 'Just come in for a few weeks and look around', or 'I want you to make up your own mind so I shall not clutter it up with my views or those of my senior staff'. There was in this sort of case an inference that the consultant was a kind of magician with a crystal ball or someone who arrived with his own preconceived ideas and tried to shape the organization to fit some pattern he brought with him.

What he did need, however, were clear and decisive terms of reference once a detailed assignment was authorized; lack of proper terms of reference could be the cause of a difference between what a client wanted from consultants and what he got!

Strategy

Corporate strategy and the consultant were dealt with in detail by Mr F. Newton Parks, the American managing director of the European division of Messrs Booz, Allen & Hamilton International. In his opinion it was generally agreed by most students and practitioners of management that strategy implied long-term issues lasting at least three years as compared to shorter term 'tactics'; he preferred to think of corporate strategy as the 'grand design' or 'broad concept' of an enterprise.

Mr Parks considered problems of strategy as put to consultants by clients and the strategy of a consultant in dealing with the client. In his experience the age of the computer was causing many consultants to rethink their own strategy. 'Some have gone so far as to buy their own computer to provide client services', he said.

Fees

Fees were the subject of various questions from delegates in industry, and the replies from the platform indicated that salaries paid to consultants range from £2,500 to £5,000 p.a. (regional managers £6,000 to £8,000 p.a.), and they were charged out to clients in the region of 60 guineas per day. The costing of the fee embraced salaries paid, out-of-pocket expenses (which were high), secretarial staff, and general administrative and publicity expenses, leaving '20 per cent of the fee revenue which most firms regard as a minimum margin between revenue and expenditure' to be utilized for 'staff-sharing, corporation tax, dividends and ploughing back into reserve'.

The tone of questioning by delegates was generally 'open-minded' towards consultancy, although one questioner could not understand how a small commercial unit could be expected to be able to afford a fee of £300 per week (per consultant) no matter what benefit might result.

POST-GRADUATE STUDIES IN FINANCIAL CONTROL

The new Department of Financial Control at Lancaster University, which was established with the generous support of the Wolfson Foundation in 1968, commences its first post-graduate (M.A.) course in October of this year.

The aim of this course is to expand the professional accounting skills of course members, and to develop competence in the wider responsibilities of financial controllership and management. Enrolment is open to experienced qualified accountants, who should preferably, though not essentially, be employer-sponsored. The department is available to advise on this aspect.

The course will be very strongly industry-orientated, emphasis being laid upon the development and use of financial data of all kinds in corporate decision-taking and planning; together with studies in financial administration and control. Extensive use will be made of case-studies and workshop techniques, planned to exact a positive contribution from all course members. In addition, special attention will be paid to the interrelationship of financial control with operations research, systems engineering and marketing.

Supervision is available also for independent research leading to a Master's degree. This, too, is open to competent qualified accountants. It is preferable that this should be of an applied nature, and may therefore be located at the place of employment.

The Director of Postgraduate Studies in Financial Control at Lancaster is Mr R. A. Fawthrop, B.A., F.C.W.A., who reports that a number of prominent companies are expressing great interest in these facilities.

6½% Man

He knows where the interest is. He's found it. In the safest possible way. In an Investment Account.

For a start, there's the big interest. Which has grown steadily all the time. From 5½% to 6%, and now to today's figure of 6½% per annum. And he can save whatever he wants. So long as he deposits at least £1 at a time. Up to a maximum of £5,000.

He had £50 in an Ordinary Account, and so qualified to open an Investment Account. If he had not had an Ordinary Account he could easily have opened one first. At any of the 22,000 Savings Bank Post Offices throughout the country.

Withdrawals are simplicity itself. He simply gives us a month's notice, and we'll have his money waiting at any Savings Bank Post Office. With interest. Which we pay without deduction. Though it is taxable.

Here's another point of interest. Savings Bank Post Offices stay open when other banks close. Even on Saturdays. So his banking is that much easier.

Absolute security, and six and a half per cent. That's his kind of interest. How about your clients? An Investment Account is the perfect answer to certain kinds of investment problems.

Companies Legislation in the 1970s

A memorandum submitted to the President of the Board of Trade on behalf of the Councils of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants ('the allied accountancy bodies').

1. INTRODUCTION

THIS memorandum has been prepared by the allied accountancy bodies in the light of the Government's announced intention to introduce a further Companies Bill during the lifetime of the present Parliament.

2. We have not attempted to reiterate all the points previously made separately or jointly by the accountancy bodies on companies legislation to the Jenkins Committee in connection with the Companies Act 1948 and to the Board of Trade in connection with the 1948 Act and the 1967 Act. The titles and dates of the various memoranda are recorded in Appendix 2 to this paper. Broadly, we have tried to approach the subject afresh in the light of the Jenkins Report and subsequent developments. We have concentrated on the matters of primary concern to the accountancy profession. Where we disagree materially with the Jenkins Report we say so.

2. THE FORMATION AND POWERS OF COMPANIES

Minimum membership

3. The Jenkins Committee recommended that the minimum membership for all companies should be two (paragraph 31 (a)), but rejected the view that it should be acceptable for private companies to have only one member. In practice many smaller companies and wholly-owned subsidiaries are beneficially owned by a single person (the other member or members having only a nominal interest). We think the Companies Act should recognize what is often the real position and permit a company to have only one shareholder.

No par value shares

4. The accountancy bodies have previously expressed support for the recommendations of the Majority Report of the Gedge Committee on shares of no par value (Cmd 9112), and continue to support the introduction of legislation enabling companies to issue shares of no par value. We think the recommendations of paragraph 34 of the Report of the Jenkins Committee (Cmd 1749) about the issue of no par value shares should be implemented.

The ultra vires rule

5. Both the Jenkins Committee and its predecessor the Cohen Committee pointed out that the ultra vires rule can work unjustly against those who enter in good faith into dealings with a company. The memorandum of a company defines its objects, which are limited to those expressly mentioned and such as are ancillary to the expressed objects. A contract made by the directors upon a matter not within the ambit of the objects is ultra vires the company, and, therefore, beyond the powers of the directors. Persons who enter into bona fide transactions with the company which are outside its powers may be fixed with constructive notice of the contents of the company's memorandum and may have no legal right of remedy against the company if it fails to complete the agreement. The Jenkins Committee cited the case of In re Jon Beauforte (London) Ltd [1953] Ch. 131 as an example of the unjust operation of the ultra vires rule. A more recent example was the decision of the Court of Appeal in 1969 in Introductions Ltd v. National Provincial Bank Ltd. In this case a bank made bona fide secured loans to a company for purposes which proved to be outside the scope of the objects clause of the company's memorandum of association. When the company became insolvent and went into liquidation the Court held that the bank had no right of legal remedy in respect of the loan because it was deemed to have notice that the purposes for which the loan was intended were unauthorized.

6. We endorse the recommendations of the Jenkins Committee in paragraph 42 of their Report to the effect that legislation should provide protection to third parties contracting with companies (a) against the unfair operation of the ultra vires rule and (b) by abrogating the rule that third parties are fixed with constructive notice of the contents of a company's memorandum and articles of association; but that there should be no change in the position of a company in relation to ultra vires contracts entered into by it.

3. CLASSIFICATION OF COMPANIES

'Proprietary' and 'Stewardship' Companies

7. Previous and present classifications. Under present law there are two main classes of company: limited and unlimited. The number of unlimited companies is currently negligible. Until 1967 limited companies were divided into three classes: exempt private companies, private companies, and public companies. The 1967 Act abolished exempt private companies, which had been excused a number of accounting and disclosure requirements, particularly the requirement to file accounts. Technically the Acts still distinguish between 'private' and 'public' companies, but for practical purposes the disclosure and filing provisions of the Acts apply equally to both classes. The Jenkins Committee recommended (paragraph 67) that there should be no distinction in law in the treatment of public and private companies.

8. We agree that the present basis of distinction between private and public companies is inappropriate and should be abolished. But we believe that it would be disastrous to try and introduce new companies legislation on the basis that all limited companies are identical in nature, have the same obligations to the public, and can reasonably be expected to observe the same requirements in such matters as the disclosure and filing of financial information.

9. Need for classification. Unless it is recognized that limited companies fall into two distinct classes we fear that the introduction of a number of important and desirable improvements in the statutory accounting and disclosure requirements relating to companies in which there is a special degree of public interest will suffer delay on grounds of impracticability, perhaps for a decade or longer.

10. The concept that there are two clearly distinguishable types of limited company is fundamental to a number of important changes in the law relating to the disclosure and publication of financial information suggested in the memorandum which follows.

11. Principles. We think it is important to recall that the first modern company statutes introduced in this country over a century ago were governed by two main principles: first, that there should be no unnecessary obstacles to the formation of limited companies; but second, that the public should be given adequate information about their affairs.

12. We believe these principles to be as valid today as they were a century ago. They have helped to make it possible for the limited liability company to become the most important form of trading organization in this country (Appendix 1, Exhibit 10). Limited companies have played, and continue to play, a leading economic role.

13. Nature of limited companies. It is, however, important to recognize that the great majority of British limited companies are not of substantial size. Some facts will help to put the picture into perspective.

14. There were over half a million companies (including unlimited companies) on the registers in Great Britain at December 31st, 1967. Ninety-seven per cent of these were private companies: that is, broadly, they had fewer than 50 members. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 1.) A substantial number of the companies registered were dormant. There is evidence that the numbers trading in 1965–66 were between 350,000 and 400,000. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 2.) Their average profit assessable to tax was £9,000. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 2.) Over 90 per cent of bodies corporate had taxable trading profits of under £10,000 in 1965–66. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 3.) Very broadly, taxable profits of this order for manufacturing concerns indicate an annual turnover of about £70,000–£80,000. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 4.) Ninety per cent of 'large' retail enterprises had turnovers not exceeding £500,000 in 1961. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 5.) The average turnover of all retail establishments (over half a million in number) was £15,000 in 1961. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 6.) There appear to be no current statistics of the number of persons employed by companies, but in 1958 over 90 per cent of all manufacturing establishments had fewer than 200 employees. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 7.)

Again, there are no current statistics about company shareholders, but the indications are that upwards of two-thirds of all companies may be under the ownership and immediate control of their directors. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 8.) By comparison there are about 15,000 public companies, of which 5,000 have no share capital (Appendix 1, Exhibit 1) and fewer than 4,000 companies are quoted on the London Stock Exchange. (Appendix 1, Exhibit 9.)

15. Principles of disclosure. The accountancy profession has been in the forefront of those who have urged the principle of adequate disclosure of financial information. There are two factors to be considered. They are: (a) what information should be provided; and (b) to whom it should be available.

16. In our view three conditions should govern the nature of the information to be provided. First, it should be meaningful. Second, it should not be disproportionately onerous to produce. Third, it should not be of such a nature as to cause risk of material damage to the business. It will be seen that the second and third conditions are more likely to be infringed in the circumstances of 'smaller' rather than 'larger' companies.

17. In our view the extent to which financial information should be made available depends on the degree of public interest in and reliance on a company. We agree, for instance, that unlimited companies should not be required to publish or file accounts, because people who deal with this type of company can look beyond it to the members for recompense in case of need; but we also agree that for the same reason such companies should circulate annual accounts to their members. In the case of limited companies we believe that the degree of public interest should be measured by reference to the interests of four groups: the members, the management, the employees, and outsiders who are or may be concerned with the company's affairs (for instance, possible investors, lenders, suppliers and customers: turnover is a convenient if crude indicator). These interests can be separately identified and assessed. In combination, they can be used to distinguish companies which involve only a limited degree of public interest from those which involve a more extensive degree of public interest.

18. We strongly support the requirement, made general by the 1967 Act, that all limited companies should, in addition to the requirement to circulate accounts to their members, be required to file accounts for public inspection. It is the view of the accountancy bodies, however, that the regulations governing the details, frequency and speed with which such information should be produced should distinguish between companies with a special degree of public interest and those with a more limited degree of public interest, and that less stringent requirements should be imposed on the latter.

19. Main types of companies – 'proprietary' and 'stewardship'. We distinguish between two main types of limited company – 'proprietary' companies and 'stewardship' companies. The distinction hinges on the separation of proprietorship and management. A proprietary company we define basically as a company whose management also owns control of it. We believe this type of company is fundamentally different from a 'stewardship' company, whose owners do not participate in management but entrust it to outside appointees. We think the two types of company should be recognized by law, and disclosure requirements introduced appropriate to their characteristics.

20. A second recognizable characteristic of the proprietary company is that the proprietor-managers are in a position to dominate every aspect of its management. There is, however, a limit to the span of control possible in a proprietor-dominated company. Above a given size business organizations can function effectively only by adopting the type of procedures for delegation of authority and internal control which are normally to be found in 'stewardship' companies, and which, once established, will tend to act as a check on the proprietors themselves. This limit may be defined by a combination of tests for degrees of public interest, number of shareholders, whether shares may be offered to the public, number of employees, and amount of turnover.

21. Definition of 'proprietary' company. We propose that a proprietary company should be defined as one

(a) which is managed and controlled by substantially the same persons;

(b) which is not under the control of another company which is not itself a proprietary company;

(c) which limits the right to transfer its shares;

(d) which prohibits any offer of its shares to the public;

(e) which limits the number of its members to 25;

(f) whose average number of employees per week does not exceed 200;

(g) which has an annual turnover not exceeding £500,000.

22. A company which has consistently satisfied all these conditions over three successive accounting year-ends (or since incorporation if that period is shorter) should be designated a 'proprietary' company and should be required to use that description in its title. The Board of Trade should have power to raise the turnover limit by statutory instrument, and discretion to permit marginal companies to continue 'proprietary' on application provided they show that any breach of these conditions is exceptional and temporary. A proprietary company would be enabled to take advantage of certain concessions as regards the financial information it must disclose in filed accounts (but not in those laid before members), and the speed and frequency with which it must prepare accounts. These are dealt with later in our memorandum. The yardsticks of size, or degree of public interest, by reference to members, employees and turnover admittedly have an arbitrary flavour, but we believe the limits proposed are a fair measure in modern circumstances.

23. The definition proposed will ensure that no company of substantial size can rank as 'proprietary'. On the other hand, many quite small 'family' companies whose owners entrust their management to outside appointees will rank as 'stewardship' companies and will be obliged to observe the same additional disclosure requirements as those imposed on larger companies. We believe such requirements are appropriate and desirable in those circumstances.

24. Obligations of proprietary companies. The main characteristics of proprietary companies as we have defined them are the substantial identity of interest between owners and managers – the managers are accountable mainly to themselves as proprietors – and the ability of the proprietors to oversee in detail all aspects of the running of their business. These are both the strengths and weaknesses of the proprietary company. Persons dealing with the company are entitled to rely on a special degree of personal concern. On the other hand it has to be recognized that this degree of personal control means that the managing proprietors can put their own interests first. It is for this reason that we consider it important that the designation 'proprietary' should be included in a company's title. People should know the nature of the concern they are dealing with.

25. Because the management will by definition be largely accountable to themselves as proprietors, however, and because, again by definition, such companies will be comparatively small in size, we believe that proprietary companies should be entitled to take advantage of some limited concessions regarding disclosure of financial information in filed accounts. We deal with these at the appropriate points later in our memorandum, but we stress that our basic intention is that proprietary companies should file accounts and make proper disclosure in the same way as 'stewardship' companies, but that they should not be required to disclose 'sensitive' figures, such as turnover and details of directors' remuneration and that there should be some alleviation of the administrative burden as regards the speed and frequency with which financial information should be disclosed.

26. By making a clear distinction between 'proprietary' and 'stewardship' companies, the way will be clear to relieve the former class of company of unreasonable accounting burdens while making it possible to impose a number of desirable additional disclosure requirements on the latter, which by definition have the greater degree of public responsibility. It is true, as noted in paragraph 23 above, that a number of 'stewardship' companies may be smaller, measured by such standards as numbers of employees and amount of turnover, than some proprietary companies, but this will be primarily because management and proprietorship lie in separate hands, and in such cases we have no hesitation in saying that management should be made accountable in accordance with the standards applicable to 'stewardship' companies, regardless of size.

27. Accounting concessions for 'proprietary' companies. The main differences which we propose between 'proprietary' and 'stewardship' companies are that the former should be exempted from having to disclose the following information in or attached to their filed accounts (though it should be included in or attached to accounts circulated to members):

(a) turnover;

(b) details of directors' and employees' emoluments required by section 196 of the 1948 Act and sections 6 and 8 of the 1967 Act;

(c) contents of the directors' report.

In addition, proprietary companies:

(d) should not have to issue interim financial statements (see paragraph 81);

(e) should have to dispatch accounts to their members not more than nine months after the end of their accounting year (12 months if they have overseas interests), compared with six months for 'stewardship' companies (see paragraph 98 (b)).

28. Consequences of failing to distinguish main types of company. It may be argued that the disclosure standards appropriate to large public corporations should be applied to all limited companies, and that companies which are unable or unwilling to comply with them should either convert to unlimited status (thus avoiding the requirement to file accounts, but not, it should be noted, the requirement to lay accounts before the members within specified time limits) or, if unlimited status is still too burdensome, to abandon corporate status altogether and continue trading as unincorporated enterprises. We think the consequences of such a line of reasoning could be unfortunate. It has been noted (paragraph 12 and Appendix 1, Exhibit 10) that the limited liability company is the most important form of trading organization in this country, and that most companies are in a relatively modest way of business (paragraph 14 above). It is too soon to judge whether, as a consequence of the 1967 Act, many limited companies will convert to unlimited status (about 2,000 converted between the passing of the Act in July 1967 and December 1968): but it is possible that if they do it may not be long before they consider whether they might not equally well abandon corporate status altogether[1] (contrary to general belief, it is arguable that under corporation tax a good many smaller companies may be at a tax disadvantage compared with unincorporated business of similar size). In our view any substantial move away from corporate status would have long term adverse effects for the economy, because the organizational framework and accounting and auditing disciplines imposed on companies by the Companies Acts have had an immeasurably beneficial effect on the management of smaller companies.

4. PROTECTION OF SHAREHOLDERS, MINORITIES AND OTHERS

Anti-fraud precautions

29. We strongly endorse the recommendation of the Jenkins Committee (paragraph 85 (b)) that the power of the Court to restrain fraudulent persons from managing com-

[1] It is a matter for speculation what the effects on the administration and collection of tax of a mass flight from corporate status would be, but we think it is unlikely to be a matter of indifference to the Inland Revenue.

parties under section 188 of the Companies Act 1948 should be extended to cover:

(a) persons convicted on indictment of any offence involving fraud or dishonesty whether in connection with a company or not;

(b) persons who have been persistently in default in complying with the provisions of the Companies Acts;

(c) persons who have shown themselves, when acting as directors of companies or when otherwise concerned in their management, to have acted in an improper, reckless or incompetent manner in relation to the company's affairs.

Protection of minorities

30. We endorse the recommendation of the Jenkins Committee (paragraph 212 (c)) that section 210 of the Companies Act 1948 (which gives the Court power to make orders for the relief of an oppressed minority) should be amended to make it clear that those powers extend to cases where the affairs of the company are being conducted in a manner unfairly prejudicial to the interests of some part of the members and not merely in an oppressive manner.

Use of experts' names in company circulars

31. In paragraph 294 (k) of their report, the Jenkins Committee recommended that a statement purporting to be made by an expert should not without the consent of the expert concerned be quoted in any circular containing a take-over offer or recommendation by the directors of the offeree company to accept such an offer. We support this recommendation but think it is too restricted. In our view an expert's consent should be required in writing as regards the use of his name in any documents circulated to shareholders by the company whether or not he has reported on their contents. Alternatively, such documents should state clearly if the contents have not been examined by the expert(s) named.

Disposing of a company's undertaking

32. The Jenkins Committee recommended (paragraph 122 (e)) that, on the principle that the function of the directors is to manage the shareholders' business, not to dispose of it, the directors of a company should not be able, without the specific approval of the company in general meeting, to dispose of the whole or substantially the whole of the undertaking or assets of the company. We agree with this proposal, with the qualification that the approval of the company in general meeting should not be required where the disposal is to an organization in which the company has directly or indirectly not less than a 75 per cent interest, or in cases where a receiver has been appointed.

Issues of shares

33. Issue of shares with limited or no voting rights. There is room for different views as to the propriety of a company's issuing ordinary or equity shares without voting rights, but in our view equity shares with restricted or no voting rights should, as a minimum, be described to show the limitation on the share certificates, in the annual accounts and in any invitation to subscribe for such shares. We think that the descriptions required should be 'non-voting' or 'voting restricted' as the case may be.

34. Issue of shares which substantially change the voting position. We consider that there should be some measure of control by shareholders over the directors' power to issue unissued shares of the company, particularly when the result is to change the control of the company or to confer a benefit on the new shareholders at the expense of the old shareholders; but the difficulty is to devise reasonable procedures for ensuring such control without at the same time imposing harmful or unnecessary rigidity on the exercise of the directors' discretion in the matter. We recommend that specific approval by the company in general meeting should be required for an issue of equity share capital carrying voting rights or of non-equity capital with voting rights (other than rights arising only in special circumstances) or of share or loan capital which is convertible into equity capital or confers the right to subscribe for equity capital, if in any of these circumstances the issue is of a significant amount, say adding immediately or in due course more than 20 (instead of the previously recommended 25) per cent of the issued voting equity, or voting non-equity capital prior to the new issue.

Rights of personal representatives

35. In their memorandum to the Board of Trade of January 1965, the English Institute submitted that the personal representatives of a deceased shareholder of a private company should be entitled to exercise the voting rights attaching to the shares held by the deceased. This was to meet the case in which the remaining directors, acting in accordance with provisions in the articles, refuse to register the personal representatives as the holders of the shares with the result that the estate of the deceased (who may have been a controlling shareholder) is prevented from exercising the voting rights which the deceased had by virtue of his shareholding. The Jenkins Committee recommended in paragraph 31 (e) of their report that section 135 of the 1948 Act should be amended so that personal representatives should be treated as members of the company with the same voting rights as the deceased member, but this was limited to the purposes of section 135. We think that recommendation is too restricted. Our recommendation is that, in addition to an amendment of section 135, there should be a new section in the Companies Acts providing that on proof of their title the personal representatives of a deceased shareholder in a company which restricts the right to transfer its shares should be entitled to exercise the voting rights attaching to the shares held by the deceased.

36. We agree with the Jenkins Committee recommendation in paragraph 212 (f) of their report that section 210 should be amended to make clear that legal personal representatives and others to whom shares are transmitted by process of law, but who are not registered as members, are entitled to present a petition or seek an injunction under that section.

5. DIRECTORS

Responsibilities and duties of directors

37. The Jenkins Committee observed (paragraph 86) that while the Companies Act expressly lays certain duties on directors, it is by no means exhaustive in this respect, the larger part of their duties and responsibilities having been determined by extensive and complex case law which does not find expression in the Act. It is, moreover, notable that, unlike the obligations it imposes on other responsible occupations, the law appears to demand no minimum standard of reasonable competence by directors (the Court will not visit directors with the consequences of an error of judgement if they have acted bona fide and have intended to do what was right and best for the interests of the company – Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co ([1925] Ch. 407). We agree with the Jenkins Committee that companies legislation should contain a general statement of the fiduciary duty of directors towards their companies, but propose that in addition an objective standard of skill and care should be required of directors.

38. We therefore endorse the recommendations in paragraph 99 of the Jenkins Report, as extended by the added words emphasized below, that the Act should provide that:

(a) a director of a company should observe the utmost good faith towards the company in any transaction with it or on its behalf, and should act honestly in the best interests of the company in exercising his powers and discharging the duties of his office, and in connection therewith should exercise the degree of care, diligence and skill that a reasonably prudent director or officer would exercise in comparable circumstances;

(b) a director of a company should not make use of any money or other property of the company or of any information acquired by virtue of his position as a director or officer of the company to gain directly or indirectly an improper advantage for himself or any other person;

(c) a director who commits a breach of these provisions should be liable to the company for any profit made by him and for any damage suffered by the company as a result of the breach;

(d) these provisions should be in addition to and not in derogation of any other provisions in companies legislation or any other enactment or rule of law relating to the duties and liabilities of directors of a company.

39. Section 147 of the Companies Act 1948 requires companies to keep proper books of account, and provides penalties if directors fail to take all reasonable steps to secure compliance with that requirement. The section also provides, however, that it shall be a defence in any proceedings taken for such failure for a director to show 'that he had reasonable ground to believe and did believe that a competent and reliable person was charged with the duty of seeing that those requirements were complied with and was in a position to discharge that duty'. We recommend that directors should be required to do more than show that they believed that a competent person had been charged with carrying out the duty: it would be consistent with recognized standards of management that directors should be required to show that they had sufficient reason to believe the delegated duty had in fact been discharged.

Compensation to directors for loss of office as directors of subsidiaries

40. We endorse the recommendation of the Jenkins Committee (paragraph 99 (h)) that sections 191, 192 and 193 of the Companies Act 1948 (requiring disclosure and approval of payments to directors for loss of office) should be extended to cover payments to former directors, and that it should be made clear that those provisions apply to payments for loss of office as directors of subsidiaries while holding office as directors of the holding company.

Disclosure of directors' interests in contracts relating to subsidiaries

41. In our view a director should be required to declare his interest in contracts with or relating to any of the subsidiaries of the company, whether or not he is a director of them.

Treatment of loans to company controlled by lending companies' directors

42. The Jenkins Committee recommended (paragraph 99 (p)) that section 190 of the Companies Act 1948 should be extended to prohibit loans by a company to another company in which one or more of the directors of the lending company hold singly or collectively, and whether directly or indirectly, a controlling interest. The object of the recommendation is commendable, but we think the implications require closer examination. The effect could be to hinder bona fide financing arrangements between affiliated companies. Rather than ban such loans, we think it would be preferable to require them to be disclosed separately in the accounts of both the companies concerned.

Disclosure in accounts of directors' pensions

43. The application of section 196 of the Companies Act 1948 (requiring accounts to give particulars of directors' salaries and pensions) is not certain in the case of pensions granted to employees who are subsequently appointed to the board of directors. We think it should be made clear whether or not section 196 applies to pensions of this type; and that where an employee became a director before retirement the section applies only to that part of his pension which is attributable to his service as director.

6. DIRECTORS' REPORT

Turnover and profitability of certain classes of business

44. Section 17 of the Companies Act 1967 requires the directors' report to disclose the turnover and profitability of different classes of business. This requirement might in certain circumstances be harmful, for instance by providing information for foreign competitors or buyers. We recommend that the Board of Trade should be empowered to give exemption from the requirement to disclose turnover and profitability by classes of business on being satisfied that it would be harmful to the interests of the company.

Power of Board of Trade to modify

45. Under section 149 (4) of the Companies Act 1948, the Board of Trade may modify the requirements of the Act as to matters to be stated in the accounts, to adapt them to the circumstances of the company. They may also approve the exclusion of certain subsidiaries from group accounts under section 150 (2) and direct that paragraph 15 (4) of Schedule 2, Companies Act 1967 shall not apply to those subsidiaries. The Board does not, however, have any power to dispense with, amend or adapt the requirements of sections 16–20 of the Companies Act 1967 relating to directors' reports. Thus, for instance, the particulars required by these sections in respect of subsidiaries, which by Board of Trade consent may be excluded from the group accounts, are nevertheless required to be given in the directors' report. We recommend that the Board of Trade should be given powers to modify, or exempt the company from, the requirements of sections 16–20 of the Companies Act 1967.

Names of directors

46. As the directors' report is the responsibility of the board of directors as constituted at the time they resolve to issue it, we recommend that the requirement relating to the disclosure of directors' names (section 16, Companies Act 1967) should be extended to include any change in the constitution of the board between the end of the financial year and the date of the resolution to issue the report.

Directors' interests in shares of the company

47. Section 16 (e) of the Companies Act 1967 calls for the disclosure of directors' interests in shares in the company or group. There may be a trust in which more than one director is interested as trustee or beneficiary or both. The subsection would require the same shares to be repeated in number against the name of each director-trustee and director beneficiary. This seems illogical: what matters is the number of shares in which the trustee-directors and director beneficiaries collectively are interested. We recommend that where directors are interested as beneficiaries or joint trustees in the same shareholding in the company or group it should be required to present the information collectively for the directors as a group instead of separately for each director, so that the share capital involved in the trust is shown only once instead of several times over.

7. UNIT TRUSTS

48. Unit trusts have increased in number and importance since the Jenkins Committee recommended in their report (paragraph 311) a new system of control, to be embodied in a new part of the Companies Act. We remain of the opinion previously expressed that unit trusts should be governed by a new Act (or new part of the Companies Acts) relating specifically to their formation, operation, management and winding-up, which Act, supplemented as necessary by statutory orders, should deal comprehensively with the whole of the law affecting unit trusts and should contain accounting and auditing requirements similar to those in the Companies Acts 1948–67, including:

(a) the keeping of proper accounting records;

(b) regular accounts giving a true and fair view;

(c) audit of the accounts by qualified auditors;

(d) the circulation of accounts to unit holders;

8. ACCOUNTS

Keeping accounting records

49. The Acts require companies to keep 'proper books of account'; and the auditors are required to state in their reports if they have not. The term is narrowly defined in section 147 of the 1948 Act, and amplified in the context of liquidations in section 331. In paragraph 90 below we point out that the term 'books of account' is archaic in the light of modern recording and accounting methods, and recommend adoption of the term 'accounting records'. In what follows 'accounting records' is used wherever appropriate.

50. The requirements of section 331 regarding accounting records are more detailed than those in section 147. For example in order to comply with section 331, it is necessary for the records to contain entries from day to day in sufficient detail of all cash received and cash paid and, when the business has involved dealings in goods, it is necessary for the records to include statements of the annual stocktakings.

51. Although section 331 of the 1948 Act applies only where a company is wound up, its requirements cannot be ignored by directors in considering whether the records give them the information necessary for a true and fair view of the company's affairs and to explain its transactions. It is plainly desirable that the requirements of sections 147 and 331 should be uniform.

52. The statutory duty of a company to keep records which give a true and fair view of the company's affairs and explain its transactions is distinct from that imposed by sections 148 and 149 of the Companies Act 1948, which require the directors to lay before the members once in every year accounts giving a true and fair view. In our view the obligation to keep proper accounting records should be regarded as continuous throughout a company's trading existence and is not necessarily discharged by the writing-up and balancing of some or all of them at annual intervals as a step in the preparation of the statutory accounts.

53. We consider moreover that modern circumstances make it desirable that companies should be required to maintain records appropriate to the nature and scale of their operations and which give reliable information as to current profitability and the adequacy of finance for current trading operations and new projects embarked on. In considering the form in and means by which these records are compiled regard must be had to the size of the company and the complexity of its operations. Some companies will have records which are less comprehensive than others without necessarily being unsatisfactory, provided that the requisite information is readily available to the directors.

54. In our view, while an improved definition of proper accounting records is necessary, undue rigidity should be avoided. Interpretation of the term is in a constant state of evolution as systems and business concepts develop. We would therefore view with dismay legislation so narrowly drawn that it might tend to inhibit the development of improved standards. We recognize, however, that any defaults which may result in a criminal charge must be capable of precise statement and for this reason suggest the retention of most of the wording of the present section 147. In all other respects we think these detailed requirements should be regarded merely as ingredients in a comprehensive system, the adequacy of which will vary in its elaboration with the nature and size of the undertaking.

55. We suggest that the law should be changed to provide that, after making due allowance for individual circumstances and needs, the management of a company should maintain accounting records appropriate to provide adequate information to run the business. It would be necessary to allow a reasonable period of grace for companies to comply with this suggestion. It is not suggested that there should be a requirement for the auditor to express an opinion on whether such information is being properly used as this would in effect require the auditor to pass judgement on the quality of management.

56. We recommend that section 147 of the Companies Act 1948 should be amended to the following effect:

(a) Every company should be required to keep proper accounting records, which should be defined as such records as are necessary to give a true and fair view of the state of the company's affairs and to explain its transactions in sufficient detail to enable the directors to inform themselves of the profitability of the company.

(b) Specifically, but without limitation of the general requirements in (a) above, proper accounting records should include adequate information regarding:

(i) all sums of money received and expended by the company and the matters in respect of which the receipt and expenditure takes place;

(ii) all income and expenditure of the company;

(iii) the assets and liabilities of the company;

(iv) except where by reason of the nature of stock-in-trade and work in progress it is impracticable, physical stocktakings at appropriate intervals, in any event at least once in each accounting period;

(v) commitments and obligations entered into by the company and not covered by items (i) to (iv) above.

(c) Proper accounting records should be deemed not to have been kept if they have not, having regard to the nature and requirements of the company's business, been maintained reasonably up to date.

(d) A company should be entitled to keep at any place where it carries on business such parts of the accounting records as relate to the operations, business and assets and liabilities of the company carried on, supervised or accounted for at such place, but there should be kept at the head office of the company or such other place as the directors may determine such records as will enable the directors to ascertain with reasonable accuracy at intervals appropriate to the nature of its business the financial position of the company, and such records should at all times be open to inspection by the directors.

57. An amendment to the proviso to section 147 (4) has been proposed in paragraph 39 above.

58. If the foregoing is accepted it should be possible to delete section 331 (2), Companies Act 1948.

Profits of subsidiaries in holding company's accounts

59. Paragraph 15 (4) of the Second Schedule to the Companies Act 1967 has given rise to problems of interpretation. It should be amended so as to make it clear that (a) and (b) thereof require the following information in respect of the aggregate profits less losses (or vice versa) of subsidiaries:

(a) the amount which has neither been dealt with in the holding company's accounts of the year nor in its accounts of any prior year; and

(b) the amount dealt with in the holding company's accounts of the year subdivided to distinguish the amounts derived respectively from current and other results of the subsidiaries dealt with.

Statement in holding company's accounts of identities and places of incorporation of subsidiaries and associated companies

60. The Board of Trade is empowered under section 3 (3) of the Companies Act 1967 to permit information about subsidiaries and under section 4 (3) to permit information about associated companies not to be disclosed if they are incorporated, or are carrying on business, outside the United Kingdom and in the view of the directors such disclosure would be harmful to any companies in the group. We think these powers of exemption should be extended to cover subsidiaries and associated companies incorporated and trading within the United Kingdom.

Statement in company's accounts of identities and places of incorporation of associated companies

61. Section 4 of the Companies Act 1967 requires a company which holds more than one-tenth in nominal value of the equity capital of another company to disclose the name, and the amount of shares held in that other company. A group of companies may hold in total substantially more than the requisite 10 per cent yet avoid the requirement to disclose if the holding is broken-up in small amounts throughout the group. We think section 4 should be amended to require disclosure of a parent company's aggregate holding in excess of 10 per cent direct and indirect, in associated companies.

Disclosure of name of a subsidiary company's ultimate holding company

62. Section 5 (1) of the Companies Act 1967 requires a subsidiary company to give in its accounts, or a statement or note annexed, the name of the company regarded by the directors as its ultimate holding company. It is possible, however, for the directors themselves to be unaware of the identity of their ultimate holding company, and either way the auditors may have no means of corroborating the information. The fact that one company has acquired control of another is material information which ought to be disclosed immediately. We think the ultimate holding company should be required to notify both the company acquired and the registrar of companies within a limited time after making an acquisition.

Materiality

63. The Second Schedule to the Companies Act 1967, which specifies matters to be disclosed in the accounts, is not consistent in its use of materiality as a test of whether an item merits separate disclosure or not. Some items need not be disclosed unless material, in other cases there is no discretion. We think there should be an overriding provision in the Second Schedule to the effect that it is not necessary to show separately in the accounts any matter specified in the schedule which is in all the circumstances not material.

Holding company's accounts: particulars of subsidiaries

64. It is submitted that, in order to give complete information in the holding company's accounts, the details as to identities, places of incorporation of subsidiaries and particulars of shareholdings therein required under section 3, Companies Act 1967, should be extended to include the identity of any subsidiary holding shares in another subsidiary.

Directors' and employees' emoluments: exemption for proprietary companies

65. We have recommended above (paragraph 27) that proprietary companies should not have to disclose in filed accounts details of directors' emoluments required by section 196 of the 1948 Act and details of directors' and employees' emoluments required by sections 6 and 8 of the 1967 Act.

Wholly-owned subsidiaries: particulars in accounts of directors' emoluments

66. The provisions of section 6 of the Companies Act 1967 require disclosure in accounts of particulars of directors' emoluments. There seems to be no useful purpose in requiring this information to be given by wholly-owned subsidiaries. Particulars of directors of subsidiaries who are also directors of the holding company must be given in the holding company's accounts. In our submission wholly-owned subsidiaries of United Kingdom registered companies should be relieved from the requirement to give in their accounts particulars of directors' emoluments. Failing this, the exemption from disclosing certain details of directors' emoluments where they do not exceed £7,500 in aggregate, given by section 6 (6), should be extended to companies which are members of groups, provided aggregate emoluments received by the directors within the group do not exceed the stated limits.

Emoluments: directors and employees receiving more than £10,000 per annum

67. We recommend that notices to the company in respect of emoluments of directors (section 196, Companies Act 1948, sections 6 and 7, Companies Act 1967) and (except as regards proprietary companies – see paragraph 27 above) emoluments (as defined by section 8 (2), Companies Act 1967) of employees receiving more than £10,000 per annum, should be required to be given in writing by such directors and employees to the company.

68. We further recommend that, to ensure that all persons employed by a company or its subsidiaries are properly included, the words 'or the employment of any subsidiary' should be inserted after the words 'company's employment' in line 7 of section 8 (1) of the Companies Act 1967; for the purposes of disclosure in the accounts of the parent company (other than a proprietary company) emoluments of its employees in the United Kingdom should be aggregated with emoluments received from other companies in the group.

Notification of substantial individual interests in share capital carrying unrestricted voting rights

69. In relation to the requirements to notify a company of substantial individual interests in voting shares provided by section 33 of the 1967 Act, nominal values may have little significance in relation to voting power. Thus the ordinary shares of a company may carry one vote per share and the 'A' ordinary shares one vote per 100 ordinary shares. The interpretation of the section is also open to doubt when there is more than one class of shares carrying voting rights in all circumstances. It is submitted that notification should only be required by section 33 when the person (or company) concerned is interested in shares which, in all circumstances, carry voting rights amounting to more than one-tenth of the total voting rights carried by all shares comprised in the relevant share capital.

70. Section 33 (4) of the 1967 Act applies the rules set out in section 28 to the interpretation of section 33. The drafting of these rules, with phrases such as 'during the lifetime of himself or another', might suggest that section 33 was not intended to refer to shares held by companies. We think it should be made clear that section 33 applies to companies as well as to individuals.

Share of profits ascribable to unquoted equity investments

71. It is frequently difficult for directors to place a valuation on unquoted equity shares and the alternative prescribed in paragraph 5A of Schedule 2 is extremely complicated to apply. It is considered that the undistributed profits of a company at any date are attributable to the equity shareholders at that date without regard to the position as it existed at the date of acquisition of investments. We recommend that the information required by paragraph 5A (c) would be more readily accessible and more realistic if the words 'since the time when the investments were acquired' in lines 3 and 4 were deleted.

72. Paragraph 5A (b) and (c) of Schedule 2 refers to the profits of bodies in which investments are held and paragraph 5A (d) refers to losses. We recommend that where the investment is held in a parent company which has laid consolidated accounts before its members, it should be made clear that the section refers to the consolidated profits and losses.

73. We further recommend that the information required by paragraph 5A should only be required in connection with those unquoted equity investments which comprise either more than one-tenth of the equity of the company in which they are held (which have to be set out under section 4) or which, in aggregate, represent more than one-tenth of the assets of the company holding the investment.

Quoted investments

74. Paragraph 8 (3) of Schedule 2 requires quoted investments to be shown separately in the balance sheet, subdivided between those investments which have and those which have not been granted a quotation or permission to deal on a 'recognized' stock exchange as defined by the Prevention of Fraud Act. There are four such 'recognized' stock exchanges, all in Great Britain (London, Midlands and Western, Northern and Scottish) so the division is in effect between securities (of whatever nationality) which may be dealt in on stock exchanges in Great Britain and those dealt in only on stock exchanges 'of repute' outside Great Britain. The purposes and application of this division are obscure, particularly bearing in mind that permission to deal in an extensive class of overseas quoted securities is granted under Stock Exchange rules. We recommend that the meaning and purpose of paragraph 8 (3) be reviewed in the light of modern circumstances.

Unquoted equity shares held by a wholly-owned subsidiary in a fellow subsidiary

75. In the case of a wholly-owned subsidiary holding unquoted equity shares in a fellow subsidiary, disclosure of information in the former's accounts is required under paragraphs 16 (1) and 5A of Schedule 2. Furthermore, if the investment exceeds one-tenth in nominal value of the relevant shares or more than one-tenth of the holding company's own assets, section 4 of the 1967 Act also applies. We do not think it necessary that all this information should have to be shown in cases where the whole of the issued shares are held within a group. It should be noted that a holding company is not required to comply with paragraph 5A in respect of unquoted equity shares held in a subsidiary (Schedule 2, paragraph 15 (2) (a)). We recommend that there should be exemptions from these provisions for subsidiary companies wholly-owned by one group.

Corporation tax

76. Corporation tax should be provided on the profits of the period to which the accounts relate. Accordingly, we recommend that paragraph 11 (10) of Schedule 2, which requires the basis on which the amount, if any, set aside for United Kingdom corporation tax is computed to be shown, should be amended to require corporation tax to be provided on the profits of the period to which the accounts relate.

Interest payable

77. Paragraph 12 (1) (b) of Schedule 2 requires interest payable to be shown in the profit and loss account divided between interest on loans repayable within five years and interest on all other loans. This is not wholly consistent with paragraph 8 (1) (d) of Schedule 2, which requires borrowings to be shown in the balance sheet divided between bank loans and borrowings (other than bank loans) repayable in more than five years from the date of the balance sheet. We think it is desirable that the disclosure requirements for balance sheet and profit and loss account should be consistent with each other.

Interest receivable

78. Paragraph 12 (1) (b) of Schedule 2 requires interest payable to be shown as a separate item, whereas interest receivable is only required to be shown if it is classed as investment income (paragraph 12 (1) (g)). We recommend that for the purpose of consistency and meaningful disclosure, total interest receivable should also be shown.

Redemption of share capital

79. Paragraph 12 (1) (d) refers to amounts 'provided' for redemption of share capital and loans. To avoid association with the term 'provision' as defined in paragraph 27 (1) (a) of Schedule 2, we recommend that the words 'set aside' should be substituted for the word 'provided' in paragraph 12 (1) (d).

Interim statements

80. We agree in principle with the desirability of companies producing interim statements, but do not think it would be practicable at the present time to require all companies to produce interim statements regardless of size and degree of public interest. We believe interim statements should be required of all 'stewardship' companies, but not of 'proprietary' companies. Unless there is effective machinery for limiting any requirement to produce interim statements to a specific class of companies, there will be considerable administrative and accounting problems, particularly for smaller companies. Such companies typically rely on firms of practising accountants to assist them in preparing final accounts, and would require the same service for interim statements. If it is required to show after-tax profits, an additional burden would fall on companies and the firms of accountants which act as their tax advisers. In any case, it may be presumed that most companies would hesitate to issue interim statements without consultation with their auditors (although this would certainly not involve anything in the form of conventional audit). The effect would inevitably be to add to the problems in connection with time-limits for publication of accounts.

81. We recommend:

(a) That companies other than proprietary companies (see paragraph 21 above) should be required to send to every member and every holder of debentures of the company a copy of an interim financial statement for the half-year ending not more than seven months after the end of the previous financial year or such other interim period as may be authorized by the Board of Trade on application from the company. It should contain sufficient information in summary form to give a fair view of the trading results of the company for the period to which it relates, and should give corresponding figures for the equivalent previous period. If in the opinion of the directors the nature of the company's business makes it impracticable to give a fair view of trading results for interim periods, the directors should be required to give such other information as will in their opinion give a fair interim indication of the company's progress.

(b) Interim statements should be dispatched within four months of the end of the period to which they relate.

(c) It should be clearly stated whether interim statements are audited or unaudited; it should not be a legal requirement that they be audited.

9. AUDITORS

Initial appointment of auditor

82. It is not unknown for a person to be nominated as auditor of a company without his knowledge. Such nomination, particularly in the event of the first appointment of an auditor by the directors, may give an auditor a statutory duty under the Companies Acts (a) which he may not be willing to carry out; (b) of which he may not even be aware, or (c) which gives rise to a conflict of interests. We submit that section 160 of the Companies Act 1948 should be amended so as to provide that advance notice of any proposal to appoint a new auditor shall be sent to the person nominated as well as to the existing auditor and that written consent to accept appointment must be obtained before appointment from the person nominated.

Change of auditors before expiry of term of office

83. In paragraphs 435 (f) and (g) of their report the Jenkins Committee recommended that an auditor should be empowered to resign during his period of office, and that if during his period of office he ceased to be qualified for appointment as auditor, or became positively disqualified, he should automatically relinquish his office. Provided the submission about the confirmation of appointments made to fill casual vacancies in paragraph 86 below is accepted we support these recommendations.

84. In order to prevent the removal of auditors before they have carried out their duties (which at present can be achieved by calling an annual general meeting at which no business is transacted other than the passing of a resolution to remove the auditors) we recommend that the Acts should be amended to provide that the annual accounts with the auditors' report thereon shall be laid before the company at its annual general meeting (see also paragraph 96 to 98 below about time limits for filing accounts).

Reappointment of auditors

85. It is usual for accountants to practise in partnership and to be appointed as auditors in their firm name. In paragraph 427 of their report the Jenkins Committee stated that the appointment of an English firm to be auditors of a company is merely the appointment of those individuals who, at the time of the original appointment, are members of the firm and are qualified for appointment as auditors. The automatic continuation provisions of section 159 (2) of the 1948 Act can give rise to difficulty where there are changes in the constitution of a partnership to the extent that there may come a time when there is no one left who was a member of the firm at the time of the original appointment. In our view there is no necessity for the automatic reappointment procedure, and it is considered that the practice which obtained under the 1929 Act, by which a substantive resolution was required for the appointment of auditors at each annual general meeting should be revived. We further submit that section 159 (2) should be amended to provide that where auditors are appointed in the firm's name all the members of the firm qualified for appointment at that time shall be deemed to be appointed auditors for the ensuing period, and the appointment of that firm should not be invalidated by reason of changes in the firm's membership during its term of office provided at least one member of the firm survives of those so appointed.

86. We recommend that section 159 (6) (which enables the directors to fill a casual vacancy) should be extended to require the directors to report the facts in their next report to the company in annual general meeting and to require an affirmative resolution at that meeting as a condition precedent to the reappointment of an auditor appointed to fill such a vacancy.

'Accounts'

87. We welcome the use of the term 'accounts' in sections 3–8 of the Companies Act 1967 as meaning the balance sheet, the profit and loss account and where appropriate the group accounts. We consider that this concept is a useful one and to be preferred to that (which no doubt remains from earlier Companies Acts) of the balance sheet as the significant document to which a profit and loss account and various statements or reports are 'annexed'. The accounts of a company should be regarded as a whole and if they are amplified by notes, these are notes to the accounts and it is unnecessary to differentiate between those which relate to the balance sheet and those which relate to the profit and loss account.

88. We submit that the legislation (particularly Schedule 2) should be amended so that, except where the context otherwise requires:

(a) the term 'accounts' shall mean:
  (i) in the case of a company without subsidiaries, the balance sheet, profit and loss account and the notes annexed;
  (ii) in the case of a company with subsidiaries, the balance sheet of the holding company, the profit and loss account (whether or not framed as a consolidated profit and loss account), the group accounts and the notes annexed;

(b) any reference to a profit and loss account shall include:
  (i) in the case of a company not trading for profit an income and expenditure account; and
  (ii) in the case of any other company any equivalent account however described and references to profit or to loss shall be construed accordingly.

Auditors' reports – section 14, Companies Act 1967

89. Section 14 of the 1967 Act, relating to the duties of auditors and the contents of their report, makes separate reference to the balance sheet, profit and loss account and group accounts as though each could be attested independently of the others. This is not so. In forming an opinion whether a true and fair view of the state of affairs and results of an undertaking have been presented auditors must take the balance sheet and profit and loss account in conjunction; similarly, when a company has subsidiaries it is necessary to read its own balance sheet and profit and loss account in conjunction with the group accounts. For these reasons, we consider, as recommended in paragraph 88 above, that the term 'accounts' should be defined and used throughout companies legislation to mean the balance sheet, profit and loss account, group accounts if any, and notes annexed, and the auditors should be required to report whether the accounts as so defined show a true and fair view.

90. The term 'books of account' as used in section 14 (4) of the 1967 Act (as well as in section 147 of the 1948 Act and elsewhere in the Acts) is archaic in the light of modern recording and accounting methods. We think the term 'accounting records' is preferable. (See also paragraph 49 above.)

91. Section 14 (5) of the Companies Act 1967 gives auditors a right of access at all times to 'the books accounts and vouchers' of the company. The term 'books accounts and vouchers' is not appropriate to modern needs and conditions and may not necessarily embrace all the records and documents which an auditor may need to examine for the purpose of his audit. Our recommendation is that auditors should be given unrestricted access to all records and documents belonging to the company which they consider necessary for the purposes of their audit.

Relationship of the auditors' report to contents of directors' report

92. Sections 16 to 20 of the 1967 Companies Act have introduced requirements to disclose a considerable amount of additional information in the directors' report, some of it of a primarily accounting nature, and have created uncertainty about the extent to which auditors may be thought to have responsibility, actual or implied, for such information.

93. The directors' report is required (by section 157 of the Companies Act 1948) to be attached to accounts laid before the company in general meeting, but is not as such subject to audit (section 163). However, certain information which the Acts require to be given in the accounts may be given, if wished, in the directors' report instead. If accounting information is so given, section 163 provides that 'the auditors shall report (on the directors' report) only so far as it gives the said information'. While it seems clear from this that the auditors are neither required nor empowered to express an opinion on the directors' report (except as noted), we are concerned lest the public be misled into believing that statements made in the directors' report generally are subject to audit. We make no recommendations at this time, but will wish to do so if the operation of the 1967 Act proves to give rise to material difficulties in this connection.

10. COMPANY AND BUSINESS NAMES

Names of companies

94. As the law now stands, an unlimited company is not required to include in its name any word or abbreviation of a word which indicates that it is a registered company. Creditors therefore cannot tell from a name such as 'A.B. & Co' whether they are dealing with a body corporate, the directors of which may have no liability for the debts of the company or with a partnership or a sole trader. We think this is a defect which should be remedied by amendment of the Acts so as to require every company which does not use 'limited' as the last word in its name to indicate that it is a company with unlimited liability by adding an appropriate designation, such as the words 'unlimited company' (or a suitable abbreviation) to its title.

Exemption from prohibition of partnerships with more than twenty members

95. We welcome the dispensation extended to accountancy and some other professional partnerships from the requirements of section 434 of the principal Act. We consider that in the case of large partnerships the disclosure of names of partners on letterheads and business stationery will be extremely cumbersome and, having regard to the need for registration under the Business Names Act, suggest that the Board of Trade should possess powers analogous to those in the proviso to section 201 (1) of the Companies Act 1948 to grant exemption in appropriate circumstances from disclosure in this manner.

11. COMPANY MANAGEMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

Returns – time limits for filing company accounts

96. The present flexibility permitted to companies as regards the preparation of accounts makes timely and effective enforcement of filing requirements impossible. We support the wish of the Board of Trade to improve the position.

97. The Board of Trade has invited our views on some tentative proposals which may be summarized as follows:

(a) Companies to be obliged to observe a financial year of twelve months, subject to certain exceptions, and to notify the Registrar of the date of ending of their financial years and of any changes therein;

(b) The periods laid down in section 148 (1) of the Companies Act 1948 as the maximum intervals between the date to which the accounts have to be made up and the date at which they have to be laid before the company to be shortened: at present the intervals are nine months, or twelve months for companies with overseas interests. The proposal is to standardize the interval at nine months for all companies, with a possible shortening to six months. The new time limits would come into effect twelve months after enactment of the new legislation.

(c) Directors to be required to lay accounts before the company at the annual general meeting and not merely at a general meeting;

(d) The obligation under section 127 of the Act of 1948 to be amended so that a company is required to file its audited accounts for the last financial year and not the annual accounts laid before the company in general meeting during the period to which the annual return related.

(e) The period within which the accounts must be filed to be related to the date on which the last financial year ended and not, as at present, to the date of the annual general meeting. If the accounts have to be laid before the company within nine months after the end of the financial year, they would have to be filed within 10½ months after the end of the financial year. If the period is shortened to six months, they would have to be filed within 7½ months.

97. We support the Board of Trade's view that the filing of company accounts should be better regulated. We are in agreement with the general spirit of the proposals above, provided there is at least 12 months' notice after enactment, but propose the following changes:

Item (a). We believe it is unnecessary and undesirable for the Board of Trade to regulate companies' accounting periods. We agree, however, that companies should be obliged to inform the Registrar of their accounting year-ends and of any change in them by more than a week either way (to accommodate those companies, for instance, whose accounting years are based on 13 equal four-weekly periods). Given this information, the Registrar will be able to check that accounts are filed within the necessary time without any need for the Board to have further regulatory power.

Item (b). In our view it would be unrealistic and impractical to expect all companies, regardless of size, to lay accounts before their members within six months of the end of their accounting year, no matter how desirable in principle this is. It must be remembered that the accounts must be reproduced for circulation to members not less than 21 days before the date of the meeting at which they are to be presented, so that the actual time available for preparation would not be more than 4½ or 5 months – perhaps less if extra allowance has to be made for printing difficulties. There is a marked concentration of company year-ends at end-December and end-March. The majority of smaller companies – which form the great bulk of all companies – very largely rely on practising accountants not only to perform the audit but to advise and assist in the preparation of their accounts. There would be a substantial concentration of work in practising accountants' offices in the period March to June which already marks a peak in tax work. It should be recognized that the critical date is the date on which the accounts have to be circulated to the members with notice of the annual general meeting, and we think time limits should be fixed by reference to this date rather than the date of the meeting itself. Accordingly, we propose that the maximum interval between the date to which the accounts have to be made up and the date on which they are dispatched to members of the company should be fixed at six months for 'stewardship' companies (see paragraph 21 above) and at nine months for 'proprietary' companies. In both cases the limit should for practical reasons be extended by three months for companies with overseas interests.

Item (e). The time within which accounts must be filed should be shortened by introducing a requirement that accounts should be filed with the Registrar at the same time as they are circulated to members. This would mean that accounts would be filed two months earlier than under the Board's proposals. If our proposals above are accepted, the accounts of 'stewardship' companies would be filed at the latest just over five months after the end of the accounting year (just over eight months if there are overseas interests) and the accounts of 'proprietary' companies at the latest just over eight months after the accounting year-end (just over 11 months if there are overseas interests). These compare with the Board's proposed latest date for filing of 7½ months for all companies after the accounting year-end.

Returns – registration of charges

98. In the interests of creditors and possible creditors section 95 of the Companies Act 1948 should be amended by reducing from 21 days to ten days the time limit for the registration of a charge created by a company registered in England. To make this possible we think it should be permissible for the Registrar of Companies to accept unstamped a copy of the instrument by which the charge is created or evidenced. Evidence of stamping should be submitted to him later.

Contents of annual and other returns

99. We consider that the detailed requirements regarding the forms and contents of annual and other returns (notably returns of allotments under section 52 of the 1948 Act) should be reviewed generally with a view to their simplification, and in our memoranda of evidence to the Jenkins Committee made a number of suggestions to that end. We would be pleased to help such a survey, if required, by making detailed suggestions.

Annual return: list of members and time for filing

100. Companies whose shares are dealt in on Stock Exchanges usually fix their dividend dates at a date before the annual general meeting, and then have to prepare for the annual return a list of members as at the fourteenth day after the date of the meeting. Though that is an appropriate date for filing particulars of the directors and the secretary, we see no particular merit in the requirement that the list of members should be made up to that date. We support the recommendation of the Jenkins Committee that companies should be given some latitude in this respect so that they could, if they wished, combine the labour of preparing the list of members with that of preparing dividend lists. In our view the list of members in the annual return should give the position on any day within three months before the last day for rendering the return.

Abolition of extraordinary resolutions

101. The only practical difference between an extraordinary resolution and a special resolution is that fourteen days' notice is required for the former and twenty-one for the latter. We endorse the recommendation of the Jenkins Committee (paragraph 468 (e)) that all reference to extraordinary resolutions should be omitted from the Act and special resolutions required in those cases where extraordinary resolutions are now required.

Two-way proxies

102. We endorse the recommendation of the Jenkins Committee (paragraph 468 (h)) that proxy forms issued by a board of directors should be required to be so framed that the member may instruct his proxy to vote for or against (or to exercise his discretion in respect of) each resolution dealing with any special business to be transacted at the meeting which the proxy is to attend.

12. COMPANIES' WINDING-UP

103. Since the Jenkins Committee reported, in June 1962, the English Institute has submitted a memorandum dated March 8th, 1965, to the Board of Trade on companies' winding-up law and rules. We would like that memorandum to be taken into consideration, along with the submissions they made to the Jenkins Committee, in a thorough revision of the relevant law and rules, in which we would be pleased to assist.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

The formation and powers of companies

1. It should be permissible for a company to have only one shareholder.

Paragraph 3

2. Companies should be empowered to issue shares of no par value.

Paragraph 4

3. Legislation should provide protection to third parties contracting with companies (a) against the unfair operation of the ultra vires rule and (b) by abrogating the rule that third parties are fixed with constructive notice of a company's memorandum and articles of association; but there should be no change in the position of a company in relation to ultra vires contracts entered into by it.

Paragraph 6

Classification of companies

4. The classification of companies as 'public' and 'private' should be abolished. Instead companies should be classified as 'proprietary' or 'stewardship' companies.

Paragraph 19

5. A proprietary company should be defined as one which has consistently satisfied over three successive accounting year-ends (or since incorporation if shorter) all the following conditions:

(a) It is managed and controlled by substantially the same persons.
(b) It is not under the control of another company which is not itself a proprietary company.
(c) It limits the right to transfer its shares.
(d) It prohibits any offer of its shares to the public.
(e) It limits the number of its members to 25.
(f) Its average number of employees per week does not exceed 200.
(g) It has an annual turnover not exceeding £500,000.

Paragraph 21

6. Proprietary companies should be so designated in their titles.

Paragraph 22

7. Proprietary companies should be exempted from having to disclose in their filed accounts (but not the accounts circulated to members):

(a) Turnover.
(b) Details of directors' emoluments.
(c) The directors' report.

Paragraph 27

Protection of shareholders, minorities and others

8. The power of the Court to restrain fraudulent persons from managing companies should be extended.

Paragraph 29

9. Section 210 of the Companies Act 1948 should be extended to enable the Court to take corrective action where the affairs of a company are being conducted in a manner unfairly prejudicial to the interests of some part of the members.

Paragraph 30

10. An expert's consent should be required in writing before his name may be used in any documents containing financial statements circulated to shareholders, whether or not he has reported on their contents.

Paragraph 31

11. Before a company disposes of the whole or substantially the whole of its undertaking or assets, other than to an organization in which the company has directly or indirectly not less than a 75 per cent interest, or other than where a receiver has been appointed, the company in general meeting should approve such disposal.

Paragraph 32

12. Equity shares with limited or no voting rights should be so described on share certificates, in the annual accounts and in any invitation to subscribe for such shares.

Paragraph 33

13. The approval of the members in general meeting should be required for any issue of shares or loan stock which may significantly affect the voting rights of existing shareholders.

Paragraph 34

14. On proof of their title, the personal representatives of a deceased shareholder in a company which restricts the right to transfer its shares should be entitled to exercise the voting rights attaching to the shares held by the deceased.

Paragraph 35

15. Legal personal representatives and others to whom shares are transmitted by process of law, but who are not registered as members, should be entitled to present a petition or seek an injunction under section 210.

Paragraph 36

Directors

16. Companies legislation should contain a general statement of the fiduciary duties of directors towards their companies, and should require directors to exercise reasonable skill and care in the performance of their duties.

Paragraph 38

17. Section 147 of the Companies Act should be amended to provide that directors shall be held to have failed in their duty to keep proper books of account unless they can show that where such duty has been delegated to another person they had reason to believe the delegated duty had in fact been discharged.

Paragraph 39

18. Sections 191, 192 and 193 of the Companies Act should be extended to apply to payments to former directors; it should be made clear that the provisions apply to payments for loss of office as directors of subsidiaries while holding office as directors of the holding company.

Paragraph 40

19. A director should be required to declare his interest in contracts with or relating to any of the subsidiaries of the company, whether or not he is a director of them.

Paragraph 41

20. Loans to a company under the control of the lending company's directors should be separately disclosed in the accounts of both companies.

Paragraph 42

21. It should be made clear whether section 196 of the Companies Act applies to pensions granted to employees who are subsequently appointed to the board.

Paragraph 43

Directors' report

22. The Board of Trade should be empowered to give exemption from the requirement to disclose turnover and profitability by classes of business on being satisfied that it would be harmful to the interests of the company.

23. The Board of Trade should be given powers to modify or exempt a company from the matters to be disclosed in the directors' report required by sections 16–20 of the Companies Act 1967.

Paragraph 45

24. The requirements of section 16, Companies Act 1967 relating to the disclosure of directors' names should be extended to include any change in the constitution of the board between the end of the financial year and the date of the resolution to issue the report.

Paragraph 46

25. Where directors are interested as beneficiaries or joint trustees in the same shareholding in the company or group it should be required to present the information collectively for the beneficiary and trustee-directors as a group instead of separately for each director, so that the total share capital involved in the trust is presented only once instead of several times over.

Paragraph 47

Unit trusts

26. There should be new legislation relating to the formation, operation, management and winding-up of unit trusts, which should contain accounting and auditing requirements similar to those in the Companies Acts.

Paragraph 48

Accounts

27. Section 147 of the Companies Act 1948 should be amended to require every company to keep proper accounting records, which should be defined as such records as are necessary to give a true and fair view of the state of the company's affairs and to explain its transactions in sufficient detail to enable the directors to inform themselves of the profitability of the company. Such records should be maintained reasonably up to date.

Paragraph 56

28. Section 15 (4) of the Second Schedule of the Companies Act 1967 should be amended to clarify the information required in respect of aggregate profits and losses of subsidiaries.

Paragraph 59

29. The Board of Trade's power under sections 3 (3) and 4 (3) of the Companies Act 1967 to permit information about certain overseas subsidiaries and associated companies not to be disclosed if in the opinion of the directors such disclosure would be harmful to any companies in the group should be extended to subsidiaries and associated companies incorporated and trading in the United Kingdom.

Paragraph 60

30. Section 4 of the Companies Act 1967 should be amended to require disclosure of a parent company's aggregate holding in excess of 10 per cent, direct and indirect, in associated companies.

Paragraph 61

31. The name of a subsidiary's ultimate holding company should be notified to the subsidiary and to the registrar of companies within a limited time after the acquisition is made.

Paragraph 62

32. The Second Schedule to the Companies Act 1967 should contain an overriding provision making it unnecessary to show separately in the accounts any item specified in the schedule which is not material.

Paragraph 63

33. A holding company's accounts should be required to disclose details of any shareholding by one of its subsidiaries in another.

Paragraph 64

34. Wholly-owned subsidiaries of United Kingdom registered companies should be relieved from the requirement to give in their accounts particulars of directors' emoluments required by section 6 of the 1967 Act. Failing this, exemption from disclosing details of directors' emoluments under section 6, Companies Act 1967 should be extended to companies which are members of groups, provided aggregate relevant emoluments within the group do not exceed the stated limits.

Paragraph 66

35. Directors and employees should be required to give written notification about their emoluments in so far as they are required to be disclosed by the Acts.

Paragraph 67

36. A holding company should be required to give information about salaries of persons employed in the United Kingdom receiving more than £10,000 a year (as required by section 8 of the 1967 Act) in aggregate within the group.

Paragraph 68

37. Section 33 of the Companies Act 1967 should be amended to require disclosure of substantial individual interests in share capital where a person holds shares carrying voting rights amounting to more than one-tenth of the total voting rights carried by all shares comprised in the relevant share capital.

Paragraph 69

38. It should be made clear that section 33 of the Companies Act 1967 applies to companies as well as to individuals.

Paragraph 70

39. Paragraph 5 (a) of Schedule 2 to the Companies Act 1967 should require the undistributed profits attributable to unquoted equity investments to be disclosed without apportionment as from the date of acquisition of the shareholding.

Paragraph 71

40. It should be made clear that paragraph 5 (a) of the Second Schedule to the Companies Act 1967 is intended to apply to consolidated profits and losses where the unquoted equity investment is in a parent company which has prepared consolidated accounts.

Paragraph 72

41. The information required by paragraph 5 (a) of the Second Schedule to the Companies Act 1967 should relate only to those unquoted equity investments which comprise either more than one-tenth of the equity of the company in which they are held or which in aggregate represent more than one-tenth of the assets of the company holding the investment.

Paragraph 73

42. The meaning and purpose of paragraph 8 (3) of Schedule 2 should be reviewed in the light of modern circumstances.

Paragraph 74

43. Disclosure of unquoted equity shares in a fellow subsidiary should not be required where the whole of the issued shares are held within the same group.

Paragraph 75

44. Paragraph 11 (10) of Schedule 2 should be amended to require corporation tax to be provided on the profits for the period to which the accounts relate.

Paragraph 76

45. Requirements for disclosure of borrowings in the balance sheet and interest on borrowings in the profit and loss account should be consistent with each other.

Paragraph 77

46. Total interest receivable should be disclosed whether it is classified as investment income or otherwise.

Paragraph 78

47. The word 'provided' in paragraph 12 (1) (d) of Schedule 2 should be amended to 'set aside'.

Paragraph 79

48. Companies other than 'proprietary' companies should be required to send interim financial statements to their members for the half-year ending not more than seven months after the end of the previous financial year, or such other interim period as may be authorized by the Board of Trade. The statements should be dispatched within four months after the end of the period to which they relate and should give a fair view of the trading results of the company for the period.

Paragraph 81

Auditors

49. Section 160 of the Companies Act 1948 should be amended so as to provide that advance notice of any proposal to appoint a new auditor shall be given to the person nominated as well as to the existing auditor, and that written consent to accept appointment must be obtained from the person nominated before his appointment.

Paragraph 82

50. An auditor should be empowered to resign during his period of office, and if during his tenure of office he ceases to be qualified for appointment as auditor, or becomes positively disqualified he should automatically relinquish his office.

Paragraph 83

51. In order to prevent the removal of auditors before they have carried out their duties, the Acts should be amended to require annual accounts with the auditors' report attached to be laid before the company at its annual general meeting.

Paragraph 84

52. Section 159 (2) of the Companies Act 1948 should be amended to provide that there should be a substantive resolution for the appointment of auditors at each annual general meeting, and that where auditors are appointed in the firm name all the members of the firm qualified for appointment at that time shall be deemed to be appointed auditors for the ensuing period, the appointment of that firm should not be invalidated by reason of changes in the firm's membership during its term of office, provided at least one member of the firm survives of those so appointed.

Paragraph 85

53. Reappointment of an auditor appointed by the directors to fill a casual vacancy should not be automatic but should require an affirmative resolution at the first annual general meeting of the company following his appointment.

Paragraph 86

54. The term 'accounts' should be statutorily defined to mean, in the case of a company without subsidiaries, the balance sheet, profit and loss account and notes annexed. In the case of a company with subsidiaries, 'accounts' should mean the balance sheet of the holding company, the profit and loss account (whether or not framed as a consolidated profit and loss account) the group accounts and the notes annexed.

Paragraph 88

55. The auditors should be required to report whether the 'accounts', as defined above, show a true and fair view.

Paragraph 89

56. The term 'books of account' as used in section 14 (4) of the 1967 Act and elsewhere should be amended to 'accounting records'.

Paragraph 90

57. Auditors should be given unrestricted access to all records and documents belonging to the company which they consider necessary for the performance of their duties.

Paragraph 91

Company and business names

58. Unlimited companies should be required to signify the fact by including a suitable designation in their title.

Mr Roy L. Lowndes announces new records in life and annuity business

Noble Lowndes Annuities Ltd

Fund increased by more than 40%

The Annual General Meeting of Noble Lowndes Annuities Ltd was held on March 18th at Noble Lowndes House, Lowndes Street, London SW1, Mr Roy L. Lowndes, Chairman, presiding. The Secretary, Mr H. M. Sunley, C.A., A.C.I.S., read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors. The following is the Chairman's Statement:

For your Company the year to 31st October 1968 was once again a record.

NEW BUSINESS

The total purchase consideration for annuities was £12,350,000 securing new annuities of £1,800,000 per annum, as compared with £7,650,000 securing £1,185,000 per annum in 1967. The corresponding figures, net of reassurance, were £12,000,000 securing £1,750,000 per annum as against £7,580,000 securing £1,178,000 per annum.

The gross life assurance sums assured underwritten amounted to £20,325,000 as compared with £14,175,000. The net figure was £17,085,000 as compared with £11,820,000. These figures underline the very fast rate of expansion in this sector.

REVENUE ACCOUNT

The Life Assurance and Annuity Fund rose to £38,187,000, an increase of almost 41%. The absolute increase was again much higher than ever before, and the rate of increase was appreciably higher than the rate in the preceding year. The ratio of expenses (including commission) to the annuity considerations and premiums was 3·82%, approximately the same level as for the preceding two years. In the face of rising costs on all fronts management are continuing actively to control expenditure and increase productivity. The yield on the Fund was £7.13.5d%, an increase of 8/–% on the previous year's figure. Investment income substantially exceeded £2,000,000 and life assurance premiums were over £1,000,000 per annum for the first time.

INVESTMENT POLICY

The distribution of investments was as follows:

	This Year	Last Year
Mortgages and Loans	37	31
British Government and Municipal Securities etc.	4	5
Debenture Stocks	23	23
Preference Shares	—	1
Ordinary Shares	15	15
Property etc.	5	4
Subsidiary Companies	16	21
	100	100

The year shows a reversion to a more general policy following the special circumstances of the preceding year. About £5¾ million was invested in mortgages and loans, redressing the proportion from an unusually low 31% to 37%. The item Subsidiary Companies remained almost exactly the same as only a minor adjustment fell to be made to the purchase price of Noble Lowndes Holdings, and accordingly its proportion diminished with the growth in the Fund. The other constituent investments were maintained at their customary proportions except preference shares which have disappeared as a significant item in the balance sheet.

GENERAL

During the year we improved our unit trust linked policy and introduced the annual premium Fortune Plan and the single premium Fortune Bond. In our design of the Fortune Plan we took the view that simplicity should be an overriding criterion. For this reason we chose a straightforward accumulator approach whereby 90% of all premiums together with 100% of all net dividends received are applied in the purchase of units. This together with a strong underlying guarantee and a loan value provides a flexible yet simple contract. At the same time we consider that our range of conventional life assurance contracts are extremely competitive, and I am very happy to mention that the interim bonus rate has been increased to 50/–% annual and compound in respect of claims occurring after 1st February 1969.

Our service to insurance brokers has been substantially improved by the creation of a small group of regional offices, the managers of which are ready at all times to provide quotations and service of a high order.

Since the end of the financial year under review, arrangements have been entered into for your Company to join the Hill Samuel Group. The new Group will provide an unrivalled range of fully integrated financial services and thus the prospects of all interested in our Company – policyholders, employees and shareholders – will be immensely enhanced.

Supplement

Company Law Amendment

IN anticipation of further company legislation, the Councils of the allied accountancy bodies, comprising the three Institutes of Chartered Accountants and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, have submitted a memorandum to the President of the Board of Trade containing their recommendations on a number of outstanding issues of concern to the accountancy profession. The memorandum is included as a supplement to this issue and we commend the recommendations to the close consideration of readers.

It is a striking testimony to the pace of contemporary development and to the place of the limited company in commercial life today, that 'matters of primary concern to the accountancy profession' should occupy 16 pages of comparatively small type, barely 20 years after the last consolidating statute.

The ultra vires rule has developed in consequence of the concept of companies as an artificial creation of Parliament. Despite the tendency to include omnibus catch-all clauses in most memoranda of association, the rule has in the past worked hardship to innocent third parties; but it is questioned whether the recent case of Introductions Ltd v. National Provincial Bank is an example best calculated to inspire sympathy, since the bank's legal advisers must have been well aware of the rule affixing third parties with constructive knowledge of the memorandum, and it is a commonplace precaution for a bank to require production of the memorandum and articles of association before granting facilities to a company customer.

It can scarcely be denied that 'limited companies fall into two distinct classes' but it appears to us that the attempt to redefine those two classes as 'stewardship' and 'proprietary' companies is one of the less felicitous inspirations of the memorandum's authors. Public and private companies have been with us since 1908 and to introduce a new terminology is as likely to confuse as to clarify. A 'public' company is, by definition, one in which the general public has a material interest; whereas a 'private' company (notwithstanding the various amendments of 1929, 1948 and 1967) is sufficiently well established as one which accepts certain restrictions as to membership and enjoys in return certain exemptions in filing information. Thus the views of the allied accountancy bodies could be accommodated under the existing labels.

'Stewardship', is a word relatively little used, save for charitable and religious fund-raising; and 'proprietary' is already in currency (in South Africa and Australia, for example) for companies not necessarily meeting the conditions now proposed. The proposal that the proprietary or private company should be required to disclose that fact in its title for the benefit of third parties is, however, a sound one.

We do not hesitate to add our voice to that of the allied bodies in strongly endorsing the Jenkins Committee recommendation that the powers of the Court to restrain fraudulent persons from managing companies should be extended – the present provisions being of limited extent and correspondingly ineffectual. We agree also that 'an objective standard of skill and care should be required of directors' since without some such requirement it is difficult to see how the proposed disqualifying offence of acting 'in an improper, reckless or incompetent manner in relation to the company's affairs' could be made out.

'Incompetence' in this context is something more than a term of abuse, and it is already established (re City Equitable Fire Insurance Company, [1925] Ch. 407) that 'the Court will not visit directors with the consequences of an error of judgement if they have acted bona fide'. However, the City Equitable case belongs to another age, and it is not inconsistent with the accepted standards of good management these days that a director professing a certain opinion should be prepared to show reasonable grounds for it.

Personal representatives of a deceased shareholder have for long inhabited a curious limbo. On the one hand, they are not obliged to register themselves as beneficial owners – and may indeed have good reason not to do so; on the other, successive Companies Acts have prohibited notice of any trust being entered in the register of members, and the articles of a private company empower the directors to refuse to register a transfer to personal representatives in their own names. In such an event (and this point was taken up by the English Institute in January 1965), the virtual disenfranchisement of the estate of a former controlling shareholder may work substantial injustice, and if personal representatives are not clearly within the ambit of relief under section 210 of the 1948 Act, a suitable modification is overdue.

The suggestion that 'proper accounting records should be deemed not to have been kept if they have not . . . been maintained reasonably up to date' is incontrovertible, and we would hardly expect our readers to deny that 'the obligation to keep proper accounting records should be regarded as continuous' rather than as a matter of annual balancing. It was, as we recall, a point of professional debate prior to 1967, apropos the standard form of audit report under the 1948 Act, whether 'proper books of account have been kept' necessarily imputed that the books of account had been properly kept. The curious lacuna between the requirements of sections 147 and 331 serves no defensible purpose and should be made good.

One purpose of the 1948 Act was to strengthen the position of auditors against arbitrary dismissal; but it would seem from paragraphs 82–86 of the present recommendations that the provisions for automatic reappointment under section 159 (2), coupled with the absence of any specific machinery for an auditor to resign other than at an annual general meeting, have created difficulties in practice. We have not seen it alleged that the expedient of calling an annual general meeting for the sole purpose of effecting a change of auditors has led to serious abuse: such a move does not in any event take the appointment out of the hands of the shareholders, though modern ethics would admit the auditor has responsibilities towards other parties also.

It would be of some interest, perhaps, to debate the point of law (which does not appear to have come before the Courts) whether the appointment of a partnership in the firm name as auditors, constitutes the appointment of all validly qualified partners as at the date of the original appointment – possibly many years ago – or as at the date of the latest reappointment. But this sort of mental exercise more befits the university than the practitioner's office, and if there is practical difficulty then the intentions of Parliament should be clarified.

We would hazard that the present forms of annual return and return of allotments have few friends amongst those responsible for their completion and stand rather as a monument to the determination of some bygone draftsman to provide space on the form for every possible eventuality, however dubious its significance. The offer by the allied accountancy bodies to participate in a survey with a view to the simplification of these forms should be accepted without ado.

In conclusion, it would be nothing less than tragedy for the wealth of careful and detailed work that is enshrined in the recommendations to stand in danger of abortion. The President of the Board of Trade said in a written answer to a question in the House of Commons last week that it was 'now unlikely' that there would be time in the 1969–70 session of Parliament for another full Bill to implement the remaining recommendations of the Jenkins Committee. If this really should prove to be so, we can but suggest that the Government should re-examine its priorities. The pressure on Parliamentary time is obvious; but the Jenkins Committee reported not far short of seven years ago. When so many of its recommendations have been endorsed by the representatives of over 60,000 members of a profession which is daily concerned at every level with the administration of companies of all sizes, we marvel at the comparative merit of certain other measures which have meanwhile accomplished their progress to the statute book.

Mergers or Conglomerates?

IN 1968 expenditure by companies on acquisitions totalled £1,779 million. This figure compares with some £781 million in the previous year and £447 million in 1966. In each of the two years prior to 1966 the sums involved just exceeded the £500 million mark. Presenting these findings, the Board of Trade Journal for March 14th noted that while the yearly totals were not exactly comparable 'there can be no doubt about the very rapid growth of acquisitions since 1966'.

Last year the total number of acquisitions was 638, scattered across all the major industries. Textiles had the largest number with 42 companies acquiring 63 others. In metal goods there were 32 acquisitions, while bricks, pottery, etc., counted 38, with wholesale distribution experiencing 56 and retail distribution 46. While public attention is inevitably focused on the large take-overs – for example, the General Electric Company's bid for English Electric, worth £277 million, representing 41 per cent of the fourth quarter's total expenditure – the fact is that nearly three-quarters of all bids in 1968 related to acquisitions costing up to £1 million. Those costing £10 million or more accounted for only 6 per cent by number, but they represented three-quarters of the total value of all acquisitions.

The BOT Journal article noted that 'two-thirds of last year's expenditure was in the nature of concentration and one-third diversification, which thus represents a significant element in the pattern of acquisitions'. Nor is there any reason to believe that this trend will not continue, hence the Government's attitude to mergers of all kinds urgently requires clarification. Its powers to refer prospective mergers to the Monopolies Commission contrasts with the role of the Industrial Re-organization Corporation, which is dedicated to enlarging the resources and competitive capacity of smaller units by encouraging their merger.

Some light was thrown on what is probably official thinking on this contentious subject by Mr Fred Catherwood, M.A., F.C.A., in a recent speech at Exeter. He pointed out that there were four main classes of merger. The first two involved the 'marginal extension of a company into something a bit outside its range' and thus constituted a 'gradual and cautious diversification'; and the industrial holding company which buys new companies 'related by some broad logic, with a well-thought-out philosophy of decentralized management'. These had been with us a long time and would remain with us.

The other two types of merger were more contentious. First, there was the conglomerate, the 'go-go' industrial holding company 'which has a very rapid rate of acquisition and can multiply its size several times in two to three years'. Then there were mergers, vertical and horizontal, within the same industry of the sort now encouraged by the IRC. According to Mr Catherwood the 'major objectives of mergers in the same industry are rationalization and economies of scale'. The 'real steam behind recent mergers within industries such as computers and cars', he said, 'has been the pressing need to provide Britain's companies with sufficient economies of scale to remain competitive in international trade'.

On the virtues of conglomerates Mr Catherwood was less happy. For, he said, 'if all conglomerates were equally successful over a sustained period, there is little doubt that there would be a sound economic case for conglomerate mergers, too'. But the 'general record of conglomerates so far is not good'. The evidence for this assertion was based upon experience in the USA where conglomerates have become a major industrial development and recent Press comment, together with the views of leading investment bodies, are rather critical. In particular, as one investment analyst told Fortune, conglomerates 'are in the earnings per share business, which defies analysis', while reputable and well-founded conglomerates have denounced the new arrivals on the scene as 'arithmetic mergers' and the practices as 'business fundamentals be damned, jazz up the stock and on to the races'

For such reasons Mr Catherwood quoted the suggestion of Mr Jim Slater of Slater, Walker that a 'constructive step forward would be for the Monopolies Commission to recommend that all companies show the exact effect of acquisitions in each year's accounts and give precise details of the profits performance of all companies under the control'. Mr Catherwood recognized the value of such proposals, but doubted 'whether recommendations from the Monopolies Commission alone will stem a strong conglomerate tide'. For him a change in company law imposing higher disclosure requirements, possibly differentiating between large and small companies, would be necessary.

Following critical comments on diversified companies which regularly reported that one or other of their divisions had not come up to forecast, with the consequent cross-subsidization of the weak by the strong, Mr Catherwood argued for the re-introduction of a more active shareholder function, not through the conglomerate but by joint action by the financial institutions. This he believed, would 'smarten up the profits of quite a lot of companies'.

Nevertheless, the facts of life and the need for industrial units capable of competition in the markets of the USA and the European Economic Community necessitated mergers to achieve comparable economies of scale to the indigenous companies operating in these areas. To this particular end Mr Catherwood was in no doubt that the present trend towards mergers within industries offers much greater economies of scale than conglomerate mergers. With the growth of industrial units, however, there was a corresponding increase in the need for 'explicit undertakings on matters affecting the public interest'.

Current Affairs

Companies Bill Deferred

IT was in June 1962, nearly seven years ago, that the Jenkins Committee made its recommendations on the reform of Company Law. The Companies Act 1967 was an interim measure which implemented only a small number of the recommendations and the Government indicated, when the Bill for that Act was introduced, that it intended to bring in another Bill in due course. However, the President of the Board of Trade announced on Wednesday of last week, that it was now unlikely that there would be time in the 1969–70 session for another full Companies Bill to implement the remaining recommendations.

Inland Revenue Tax Collection

THE bulk of the discussion turned on collection when Subcommittee C of the Estimates Committee dealing with the Revenue took evidence from Mr N. C. Price, Deputy Chairman of the Board, Mr H. H. Leedale, Controller of Surtax, and Mr F. H. Brooman, Accountant and Comptroller-General, at its last reported hearing on February 26th.

Mr Brooman gave a number of reasons for recent increases in arrears of tax outstanding. One was that since the passing of the Income Tax Management Act 1964, inspectors had begun to make assessments at various times of the year, whereas the bulk of assessments had formerly been made in November; many assessments now were made in July and August. The month of September was the time for getting out statistics of arrears, so naturally more tax appeared in them. That was an increase which was more apparent than real. Credit restriction had meant that the normal processes of borrowing from the bank to pay one's income tax and surtax had been interrupted. Acting on Government directions, the banks now were not advancing money for this purpose.

Mr Brooman then turned to enforcement. The time-honoured method of distraint was much less effective because things like furniture, motor-cars and television sets were largely held on hire-purchase and therefore could not be taken. Indeed, hire-purchase had resulted in all second-hand furniture having very little value.

Mention of distraint caused some criticism from a member of the committee who looked for humane methods of collection, particularly where the debtor was, say, an old age pensioner. Mr Brooman said that in the year to September 1968 distraint was levied in 6,016 cases only, and goods were taken and sold in only 35 of those cases. The vast majority of defaulters usually made a satisfactory offer of payment by instalments once the bailiff had appeared.

Apparently one cause of the increase in arrears is the advent of the affluent society. People had bigger incomes without being used to setting money aside for income tax. This applied particularly to people who had formerly been within PAYE and had ceased to be so, as by becoming sub-contractors, but who continued to live from hand to mouth.

Mr Leedale indicated that about 10 per cent of surtax payers employed professional advisers. Mr Price said that the accountancy bodies 'do come and see us as a body quite frequently and voice quite loudly and strongly the, so to speak, cumulative complaints of all their clients'. He said that accountants in general complained of the very existence of surtax as a separate tax and argued that it should be integrated with income tax.

Britain's Economic Liberalism

BRITAIN has 'reached the stage when it is impossible to tell which industries we are good at and which we are bad at'. The explanation for this state of affairs, described by Professor Harry Johnson at the annual dinner of the Institute of Economic Affairs, is the belief in Britain that protection in all its manifold forms had been beneficial, either directly as an expression of political intelligence or indirectly as a guarantee of a bargaining power in international negotiations, which has never been needed.

The lesson to be learned, according to Professor Johnson's address published recently in an IEA Occasional Paper 27 (IEA 5*s*) is that Britain could greatly benefit by a unilateral reduction or elimination of protection of domestic industry in all its forms.

Lord Cromer, in an address to the same audience also reproduced in the Paper, commenting on the balance of payments problem, stated that even if present government hopes are fulfilled, economic equilibrium will only be maintained 'by the continuation indefinitely of the emergency measures now in force'.

The ex-Governor of the Bank also referred to current interest in the supply of money and the gradual realization by the authorities that the tax system could not invariably be relied upon to soak up all the excess purchasing power. There is, he said, little purpose in seeking to create an international monetary system on the basis of national currencies which are unsound.

Looking Back on Hardy Heating

FOR many managers and accountants the traditional pattern of their Sunday morning activities over the past ten weeks has been broken by their TV viewing of the unfolding story of Hardy Heating Co Ltd. Now that the series has come to an end it is timely to make an appraisal of this BBC1 TV experiment in teaching management accountancy techniques to the non-financial manager and the accountancy student.

It can be said at the outset that the producer, Paul Ellis, wholly succeeded in overcoming the unrealism of an earlier series, Fothergale & Co Ltd, and there must be many viewers who feel that the dramatic sequences had an air of authenticity about them. The clashes between the temperamental works director, Sam Howell, and the young chief accountant, John Marsh, over the employment of new (and not so new) management accountancy techniques are probably mirrored in many similar firms to Hardy Heating Co Ltd, and this aspect of the presentation merits high commendation.

However, for the manager who is unfamiliar with the day-to-day language of accountancy and finance, it must have required a considerable degree of mental effort and dexterity to follow Mr Graham Turner's, admittedly competent, graphical presentations of the background detail to the weekly dramatic sequences that were being enacted in Hardy Heating Co's factory. Despite the very useful (and essential) textbook[1] that was available to provide detailed supplementary reading to accompany the series, it seems likely that many non-accountant viewers might be unable to keep up with explanations on the TV screen of the theory and calculations which are essential to an understanding of the subject.

The limitations of the television screen unfortunately do not permit the use of large-scale graphic presentation and the natural desire to make full utilization of the available time sometimes necessitates the use of 'snapshot' techniques; but if the BBC is planning a further series (which it surely ought to), then perhaps it might consider publishing a series of case study viewing cards which could be keyed directly into the visual presentation for each episode. Such material could supplement the excellent handbook, which remains an essential part of the background study literature, and would provide an easily-followed guide to the points that are being explained by the narrator.

The time of showing for this series was probably not the most convenient for many potential viewers and it may well have suffered from the rival attractions of the golf course or washing the car. The BBC should arrange to give the series an early re-run, preferably on a mid-week evening at a time when most managers will have returned from work and completed their evening meal, as many of those who have followed the first presentation would probably welcome an opportunity for a second hearing of the discussions that took place in Hardy Heating Co's offices.

The producer can afford to be well satisfied with this ambitious venture and its success is beyond doubt. For a long time, from now on, Sunday mornings will not be quite the same without the weekly argument between Sam Howell and John Marsh – and that is the measure of Paul Ellis's achievement.

Profits from Woodlands

SINCE 1963, Schedule B tax has been confined to 'the occupation of woodlands in the United Kingdom managed on a commercial basis and with a view to the realization of profits'. Provided that the taxpayer does not elect to be charged under Schedule D, his profit is arbitrarily calculated as one-third of the annual value. This is little, and it is not surprising that the Inland Revenue seek to dip their net a little further where the taxpayer carries out operations on the timber beyond the mere felling and sale of the trees. They have been consistently unsuccessful (Christie v. Davies (24 ATC 34); CIR v. Williamson Bros (29 ATC 193)). The latest case is Collins v. Fraser which was decided last week by Mr Justice Megarry.

Mr Collins began business in 1953 making thin boards, largely from timber bought in. Then, about 1958, he bought more machinery and started making boxes of thin boards. He owned a wood of about half an acre but it became exhausted in 1959 and he bought a further 33 acres at a place some 12 miles from his sawmill. There were seven stages of manufacture which were briefly: (1) tree felled; (2) trimmed of its branches; (3) cross-cut to 30-ft lengths; (4) removed to mill and reduced to 5-ft lengths; (5) reduced to planking of from 1 to 1½ in. thick; (6) converted to thin boards, thin wood or box boards; (7) made into boxes.

The Revenue assessed Mr Collins to tax under Schedule D on profits arising from operations away from the wood. He appealed and the General Commissioners held that any profits arising after the stage when the timber was transported to the mill were assessable under Schedule D. Mr Collins then appealed to the High Court.

Megarry, J., said, as reported in The Times of March 15th, that the principle applicable was as stated by Lord Cooper in the Williamson case, that is, that anything done to make the timber marketable was covered by the Schedule B assessment. He remitted the case to the Commissioners to say what it was, up to and inclusive of stage (5), which extended beyond normal preparation of the timber for market.

THIS IS MY LIFE

by An Industrious Accountant

THE chairman has been feeling discontented recently. The chairman has been fretting over not getting his own way. The chairman, in short, is suffering from delusions of grandeur and is determined, coûte que coûte, to bulldoze all opposition.

Nowadays, directors of even the most exalted rank are supposed to work primarily as a team with their colleagues, subordinating all personal ambitions to the common good. Their function is that of loyal organization men seeking consensus of opinion as far as possible. In one sphere of responsibility, however, our chairman still reigns supreme by ancient and hallowed precedent. He still selects the style, design and lay-out of the annual report and accounts to the shareholders.

In my early days this booklet was seen as of limited value. It was, in fact, a small pamphlet with the statutory minimum of financial information in the profit and loss account and balance sheet, with a directors' report which merely repeated the appropriation account items, and with a curt little annual meeting agenda. Its sole concession to aesthetic impact was a long flowery tail on a couple of the capital letters in our company title and some scrollwork around 'the umpteenth ordinary meeting'.

The chairman has rung some modest changes over the years. Once he tried a cover with a symbolic horseman riding into a cloud-bordered sunset in his artistic days; then a starkly rectangular monolith with a serrated stairway when we were losing money; and several coloured photographs with gold-leaf flourishes when we translated our capital reserve into bonus shares.

Last week he came into my office with a sheaf of annual reports from our bigger national industries and asked what I thought of their layout shareholder-impact-wise. There was, for example, a mining concern with 45 pages of data, plus three more blank pages for notes. Besides its long directors' report it had coloured aerial photographs of its excavations, a hotchpotch of accounts for the company, the group, and affiliates, three special reviews and eight full-page graphs plus a page of highlights.

There was a motor company's report with coloured pages featuring lovely smiling girls getting into cars, getting out of cars, and draping themselves around cars. It included ten-year tabulations, numerous bar-charts ('I used to like the old cut-the-cakes', said the chairman wistfully, 'but they're obsolete now'), vehicle price-lists, a take-over explanation, consolidated accounts, future prospects and a sort of cautionary addendum.

There were at least two with super-glossy paper and impressive statistics, which didn't mention from beginning to end what they bought, made or sold, thus striking the reverse note.

The chairman wanted to emulate the best of them. Pictures of customers thronging through the aisles, of stylistic window-displays, of gorgeous gowns . . . why shouldn't we let ourselves go? 'Damn the expense,' he snorted, 'you accountants are always grumbling about costs! Don't you know we're well able to afford it? Besides, we meet half the costs by savings in the tax bill'.

The point I was trying to make was that we're a simple retail company whose shareholders are mostly private citizens, numerically speaking, although our registrars' lists in the past decade have proliferated in insurance companies, bank nominees and investment giants. They want profits, not perorations; dividends rather than avant-garde art-work; share escalation instead of past history. Their first response to the chairman's idea of making a splash would be to ask grumpily what it cost.

Suppose we said fifteen bob a head, off the cuff, it would still sound extravagant. We don't claim a large number of shareholders, nothing to rank with ICI's 300,000 numbers, but ours are voluble and apt to call a spade a so-and-so spade when their pockets suffer. Old-fashioned policy it might be, but let's stick to penny-plain.

My chief was unimpressed. What about letting 'em see, just for once, their directors who've done so well for them, or the past chairman who pioneered our enterprise, he remonstrated wistfully. These chaps should be commemorated, not forgotten; we give O.B.E.s to everybody except our industrialists, dash it; talk about the forgotten army!

If he'd included pictures of past and present chief accountants, I'd probably have supported him!

Computer Systems and Internal Audit

by H. WASHBROOK, F.C.I.S., F.B.C.S., A.M.B.I.M., M.O.M.S.

THERE is commonly a misunderstanding as to the relationship between modern management systems (particularly those involving computers), and the function of internal audit. The writer has grown up first in the punched card, and subsequently the computer, era but he would like to think that even before the general use of these mechanical and electronic aids, internal audit in the larger organizations was predominantly concerned with the audit of systems.

Undoubtedly the spot checking of cash books and other methods of frustrating dishonest manipulation of an organization's assets by a very small portion of the population have their place in any audit system, though this must be a relatively small place – important but routine.

Dangers from complexity

With the modern complexity and volume of business, the danger of an incorrect appreciation of any summary position resulting from the co-ordination of much data often expressed in many terms, is most likely to be due to negligence, incompetence or genuine mistake on the part of individual employees. It is also easy to draw incorrect conclusions from a mass of co-ordinated figures, owing to the fact that some personnel have manipulated or processed these figures in a non-standard way.

Nevertheless, some organizations purport to carry out internal auditing when there is little or no codification of procedures within the organization, anyway in written form. There are often various ways of carrying out data processing, the differences between which are minimal from the cost and final result point of view. The final choice, for standardization purposes, is often a matter of personal or policy preference.

There are some organizations in which internal auditors form part of a systems department, or at any-rate come under the umbrella of the management services function. The writer holds no brief for the inclusion or not of internal audit in this way. These facts are instanced merely to indicate that there is a strong affinity between internal audit and systems work generally. As a minimum the internal auditor should be privy to the specification of standard systems. It should be one of his main activities to ensure that the company's systems are carried out and, therefore, that the result of data processing embodied in the accounts reflects the correct position of the company's affairs.

The author of this article is Group Management Services Manager of The Prestige Group Ltd.

The other basic fallacy that attaches to the internal audit function (or the external audit for that matter) is that, in some mysterious way, the principles of audit are different when applied to computer systems than to any other systems. Obviously the existence of a computer will affect such things as the number of spot checks that are made by the audit personnel and the emphasis that they place on parts of their checking.

For example, if it is deemed expedient to check a certain percentage of calculations carried out by an army of clerical personnel on a non-computer basis, then undoubtedly the percentage of checking can be very much smaller in the case of computer calculations, once the programs have been approved by internal audit. Thus the emphasis is directly on human frailty in non-computer operations, whereas in computer operations it is on human frailty built into the system.

Strangely, it seems to be accepted as axiomatic that when an auditor is concerned with a computer system he should thereby know all about the 'innards' of a computer and almost literally be able to dismantle and assemble it. Do accountants generally know the intricate mechanical details of accounting machines? Yet such machines have been in common use for very many years without any apparent disability. The simple truth is that a computer or accounting machine can very well be construed as a 'black box' for audit purposes. Provided the auditor knows that when certain information is fed to it, the output should appear in a certain form and he has means of being able to pre-calculate that output manually as a check, then that is all he needs to know.

It cannot be denied that some knowledge of computer operation is likely to be of value to almost anyone in the modern world; but when it is necessary to make specialized use of such general knowledge, as for instance in the audit field, very great care and a good deal of understanding is required.

Control

One has encountered the view that it is not possible for computer programmers or operators intentionally to defeat the objects of processing by producing incorrect results, without this being known. This also, of course, is complete nonsense. In the last analysis the only constraint that one can apply in these circumstances is that of making it very difficult for such personnel to transgress, intentionally or otherwise, without it being immediately apparent; and to devise the system in such a way as to make it virtually a certainty that the error will be discovered sooner or later.

The sort of possible discrepancies referred to in the previous paragraph are those which are relatively small or which partake of the nature of compensating errors within the larger control system. It is taken for granted that there will be a control system in operation which will highlight significant errors, if not locate them.

It is also important to realize that with modern systems, especially computer systems, control tends to be built into the system rather than imposed on it from the outside. It is axiomatic that there should be audit controls outside the computer department, but such outside controls should increasingly be on the built-in controls of the system itself, rather than on the detail prepared by it.

It is not proposed in this short article to dwell on the sort of 'normal' accounting controls that one can impose on input to and output from a system, especially as many readers will doubtless be extremely well practised in this area. Instead it is the intention to concentrate on some of the computer control systems aspects with which the auditor should be concerned.

Computer control standards

The control standards for computer systems may be divided into five classes:

(a) Overall standards.
(b) Standards applying to systems analysis and programming.
(c) Operating standards.
(d) Control (in the narrow sense) standards.
(e) Inbuilt computer edit features.

The auditor should realize that the term 'standards' is a comprehensive one which is being increasingly used in the computer area to refer to the standard way in which computer problems should be approached; the way in which proposals should be submitted to higher management for approval; methods of systems analysis and programming; charting in the form of block diagrams and flow charts of the detailed approach to an organizational system and the subsequent detailed programming; maintenance of detailed records of programs; the way in which computer operation is carried out; the standard way of dealing with corrections, etc.

It is extremely desirable that the whole of these procedures should be set out in written form, although it is probably true that few installations have entirely achieved this ideal. Even people who have not been connected with programming in any way, knowing the very detailed and hence complicated instructions that must be given to a computer and the many mathematical and logical ways in which it is possible to achieve the same answer, will begin to realize the absolute necessity of maintaining comprehensive and accurate records.

The interaction of the different parts of the same program on each other and on data being processed, as well as the increased integration of programs in a complete system, mean that it is quite impossible for even the original programmer to make amendments to a program without very detailed reference to the file data he has established. A new programmer will obviously require much more file guidance and it is clear that there will be considerable communication difficulties unless such information is maintained in a standard way. Many installations have experienced serious trouble by not keeping adequate records, and with increasing complexity of systems this requirement is even more necessary.

Overall standards

Overall standards are concerned with the organization of the computer department, the interaction of one section upon another, the way in which jobs are tackled and the authorities, disciplines, etc., to be accepted.

Standards affect the auditor in the following ways:

(1) It is obvious that an auditor cannot be expected to satisfy himself of the technical competence of such standards, but it is basic that he should establish that they exist and that on the face of it they appear to be comprehensive. In particular he will be concerned with control, authorities, and security.

(2) The block diagrams and flow charts should be consulted by the auditor in respect of any system he is auditing or in the installation of which he is participating. If these diagrams are prepared in accordance with the generally accepted manner, the auditor can certainly follow the logic of them without any computer knowledge although he may not understand some of the 'frilly' bits. With a little computer systems knowledge he should be able to obtain a good command of the principles of the system.

(3) The auditor should interrogate the authority to amend standard records and it should be part of his audit check to scrutinize closely any amendments which have been made since the previous audit, to satisfy himself of the accuracy of the new output.

(4) Such standards are the basis of the auditor's conception of what inputs to the systems are supposed to generate in the form of outputs, and therefore enable him to check the accuracy of such outputs as part of the validation of a new system and to arrange spot checks on it thereafter.

Systems analysis and programming standards

The standards applied directly to systems analysis and programming should be aimed at compelling systems analysts and programmers to tackle problems in a standard way and to carry out their functions generally in such a way, even at the expense of a small percentage of tasks to which individual application might be more efficient. The larger the installation, the more important this is, as it is absolutely imperative both for supervision by the chief programmer or data processing manager and for the audit of any kind that this be done.

Programmers should not have authority to alter a program without the knowledge of the head of the department which the program serves and the detailed authority of the chief programmer. It is necessary to insist that contravention of this rule should be treated extremely seriously.

Computer operating standards

In the field of computer operating it is possible to be very specific in standards. A programmer should develop the necessary operating instructions to be followed by the operator in the use of every program he generates and, additionally, operators should be controlled generally by written standards.

There should be two persons on duty in the computer room at any one time, so that there is no possible deviation in the operating field without collusion. The log produced by the monitoring typewriter should be sequentially numbered and should embody a carbon copy, which should never leave the computer department, as a complete record of processing. The top copy can be used for action purposes. This method enables the detection and recovery of errors which have been made innocently, and certainly makes deliberate mis-operation difficult but not impossible.

Internal control standards

So far, we have been speaking of control in an overall sense by standardizing work processing and recording. Within the computer department there should also be an internal control section, by whatever name called. This section should not be supervised by programmers or systems analysts at any level and should exercise control on the input to the computer and the output therefrom in an 'accounting' manner, e.g., batch totals etc. The section will usually be responsible also for the data preparation section with which this sort of control is necessarily involved, but in any event the data preparation section should not be supervised in any way by the programmers or systems analysts.

It should be an important part of the auditor's function to be satisfied that the computer department internal control is well based in principle and effective in operation.

Inbuilt edit features

One of the great advantages of computer over manual checking is that, if the necessary detail is specified at the systems analysis stage, it is possible to codify every conceivable check that can be made on data. Once the computer has been programmed to do this, it will apply these checks even though the points to be checked run into scores on every item of data processed.

This would be impossible on a manual basis, for where a clerk is supposed to check on half a dozen or so items even the most conscientious individual will occasionally forget or miss something due to interruptions. This check by the computer is called 'editing' and it should be a requirement of the auditor to satisfy himself on the standards of the edit functions of the computer and, specifically, what the edit features cover in any system being audited.

Hardware controls

Although the controls built into the hardware to ensure correct output are theoretically the concern of the internal auditor and doubtless he could obtain full information on these in suppliers' literature, the standard of all well-known manufacturers of computer equipment of today is such that this can be taken for granted.

After all, we assume that an adding machine gives the right answer to the information keyed in unless and until we obtain clear proof to the contrary. It is suggested here that the auditor should be more concerned with the possible implications on accuracy of the selective use of hardware. Easily understandable examples of this concept are the maximum use of the by-product punching of cards by the computer for use on subsequent cycles, and the maximum gang-punching at the data preparation stage of punched cards to reduce the amount of verification required.

Systems design

Enough has been stated, it is hoped, to indicate that the internal auditor should at least be consulted at the systems design stage, and it is strongly recommended that he should take an active part. Apart from the overall system considerations, it may well be that it is desirable to build into the programs such facilities as will assist the following of the audit trail, either on a regular basis or as required by the auditor.

Audit trail

In many cases it is wrong to assume that time-honoured audit trail techniques cannot be followed even where facilities have not been deliberately built in to the program. In most instances the input data, plus intermediate controlling or statistical data print-outs and final print-outs, will provide such control. Where it does not, special facilities can be built into the program as suggested above.

Testing of programs

Considerations of testing can be divided into two. First, the initial testing of programs by the programmer, commonly called 'debugging', with the object of amending a program until it is approved for operation, can be a very profitable area of involvement for the auditor. There is much to be said for the internal auditor providing, or assisting the departmental functions in providing, the test data necessary rigorously to check the program. This is a very practical way of the internal auditor satisfying himself of the validity of programs from an audit point of view.

Secondly, it is highly desirable that the auditor should have a test pack with which he can, on an unscheduled basis, follow routine run-offs against the program to satisfy himself that the program is still functioning correctly either after a program change or otherwise.

Security

The auditor's concern in regard to security relates to the confidentiality of information whilst being processed in the computer department, records of input and output, etc. He should also know what arrangements subsist to recover situations where data is lost or destroyed. Basically, data processing arrangements should be such that media, such as discs or magnetic tapes which hold important information, are copied immediately they have been validated and held in another location to reduce risk from fire, etc., or such information should be located elsewhere than the records from which it may be re-constructed.

Such media are normally combined with fresh data to form an updated media, to carry forward for the next cycle and so on. If one makes an analogy of the grandfather, father and son evolution (which is, in fact, how the technique is described), then it is sound practice not to destroy grandfather until the son has been approved, thereby enabling the new son to be reconstructed if defects are discovered in him.

Summary

The audit of systems involving computers requires a shift of emphasis from the form of audit used in non-computer systems, basically by taking a greater part in the systems design and setting up, and the creation and checking of computer department standards. Moreover, increased emphasis should be given to source data for if these are incorrect, it will invalidate subsequent multi-processing. This again involves a much greater emphasis on data preparation for the same reason. Thereafter, checks can be based on a selective and relatively small proportion of operations, both on the processing itself as described above and also by requiring a print-out of computer master files on a spot check basis.

To end as we began, the auditing of computer-orientated systems means a high degree of standard setting, and the involvement of the internal auditor in systems work to possibly a far greater extent than he has previously been accustomed.

Group Tax Planning

Domestic Operations

by R. J. PICKERILL, F.C.A.

WHEN consideration is given to the conduct of business and the decision to have corporate status has been made, one has to decide whether to use one company with divisions, or whether it would be better to divide the business of the company between several companies. When a company is acquired would it be better to transfer the trade to that of the acquiring company or to carry on the acquired business as a separate entity?

The decision to do any of these things will generally depend on commercial rather than taxation considerations, but no one these days can take such decisions without taking cognizance of the taxation effects. For the purpose of this paper it is assumed that someone else is taking care of the commercial considerations and that we have to consider the tax problems involved. Before we can proceed to make our decisions we must know the consequences of what we do and we must know, therefore, what we mean by a group or by a consortium.

Definition of group

There are two separate definitions which apply to groups of companies; the first applies to groups of companies who have the right when they make the requisite election to pay dividends and interest gross under section 48, subsections 3 and 7 of the Finance Act 1965. A group for this purpose is a parent and subsidiaries where the subsidiaries are companies in which the parent owns at least 50 per cent of the issued ordinary share capital. Now for this purpose the ordinary share capital is any capital in issue other than shares with a fixed rate of dividend or one varying only with the rate of income tax, and so far as participating preference shares have a right to a share in the profits after the fixed rate of dividend, they qualify as issued ordinary share capital for this purpose. Note, however, that share dealing companies and non-resident companies cannot claim.

The second definition which concerns us is that of a group in Schedule 13, Finance Act 1965, for the purpose of capital gains in regard to roll-over relief, or where assets are transferred between members of the group without liability to corporation tax on capital gains. Secondly, the same definition of a group applies for the purposes of the interchangeability of trading losses within a group which is called group relief, and thirdly, this definition of a group is applied in determining whether interest paid abroad by a parent on behalf of a resident subsidiary can be allowed as a charge on income under section 52, Finance Act 1965. In all these cases a group is a parent and subsidiaries where the parent owns 75 per cent of the issued ordinary share capital of the subsidiaries.

Consortia

There are, again, two definitions of consortium. The first is that which applies in respect of payments of dividends and interest gross and requires that 75 per cent of the issued ordinary share capital of a trading company must be owned by five or fewer companies, none of which owns less than 5 per cent. The second definition is quite different and applies for loss relief purposes. It is an entirely different animal; for a consortium claiming loss relief must consist of five or fewer companies owning directly 100 per cent of the issued ordinary share capital of a trading company.

Bear in mind that a group and a consortium can interpose a holding company holding 90 per cent of the issued ordinary share capital of a trading company.

Two points are of special importance and must be noted. First, if a consortium wishes to elect with the jointly-owned company to receive dividends gross, the election can only be made by five members of the consortium; although six companies holding 100 per cent of the shares of a jointly-owned company, none of which owns less than 5 per cent, could qualify as a consortium because 75 per cent is held by five companies. The Act requires that the election for payments of dividends and interest gross must be made by the jointly-owned company and the five or fewer companies holding 75 per cent of its shares, of which the claimant is one. In consequence the sixth company is excluded.

Secondly, one must remember that with regard to group relief a company which qualifies as a subsidiary because the parent company owns 75 per cent of the issued ordinary share capital, cannot be treated as a company owned by a consortium, so that if one company owns 75 per cent of the issued ordinary share capital of another company then the third company owning the other 25 per cent will not get any relief.

Parent company

Having seen what constitutes a group and what is a consortium, we now have to consider the position of the parent company. Should the parent company of this group operate as an investment company which will be eligible to set off against its income for corporation tax purposes, management expenses under section 57 of the Finance Act 1965; or should the parent company be a trading company carrying on a trade, perhaps complementary to the trade carried on by other trading subsidiaries; or again, should we treat it as a managing company carrying on the trade of managing the group?

The difficulty about having a parent company as an investment company is that the income of an investment company may be income which is not subject to corporation tax, either because it is franked investment income or because it is group income; further, if the investment company has been subject to corporation tax and the management expenses exceed the income, the excess can be carried forward and set off against future income as a loss but it cannot be set off against the income of a preceding year. Again, if the investment company has only franked investment income or group income there can be no group relief because group relief is set off against total profits.

If, on the other hand, the parent company is a trading company and it is carrying on a trade, the trading company can claim all '57 varieties' of loss relief and group relief. If, therefore, the parent company is not carrying on an independent trade, but carries on the business of managing the group of companies, then it can be claimed that the parent is carrying on a trade of group management assessable to tax under Case I, Schedule D. The parent company then obtains its income from charges for the services it provides to the subsidiary companies against which income it is able to set off the expenses which it incurs. If these expenses exceed the income it receives, the result will be a loss which can be set off against the profits of the other companies who are members of the group as group relief or can be carried backwards against income of a preceding year or carried forward, and therefore, there will be considerably more flexibility.

Group income

The definition of a group of companies for the payment of dividends and interest was referred to at the beginning. Now provided that the group or consortium makes the appropriate election three months before paying interest or dividends, either can be paid gross. Interest effectively transfers a charge to corporation tax from one company to another, for it is chargeable to corporation tax in the hands of the recipient company and allowed as a charge on income by the paying company. Dividends are, of course, neither a deduction nor a chargeable receipt for corporation tax purposes, for the effect of paying a dividend gross is merely to transfer money from one company to another without any effect at all on the corporation tax of either company.

Where there is a company which is likely to suffer a loss or an excess of management expenses, then an arrangement can be made for a loan from that company to be made to the other, so that the interest which will be received gross to avoid any liability to income tax will cover the excess management expenses of the recipient company. It will be appreciated that where there is a loan from one company to another, the interest can affect the total taxation liability of the group because it effectively transfers part of the profit of one company to another and could, therefore, absorb the losses or excess management expenses. This means that interest can have the same effect as a management fee to the parent from the subsidiary, while a dividend will not do this.

It must be borne in mind that a dividend need not be paid gross even if an election has been made, because one still has the right to deduct tax and account for it to the Revenue under Schedule 12. This can be useful where a subsidiary company receives franked investment income from outside the group, such as dividends from trade investments from which income tax has been deducted, and by deducting tax on payment of a dividend to the parent one can transfer the credit of this income tax to the parent company so that that income tax can be set off against the dividend paid by the parent.

Similarly, it can be advantageous if a subsidiary company has preference shares in issue to give it franked investment income, so that the tax suffered on the franked investment income can be set off against the tax deductible from the preference dividend which would be payable to the Revenue. By transferring a trade investment from another company in the group to that subsidiary, the group will effectively save at least the interest on the money used in accounting for the tax.

Losses

Now a look at trading losses. Irrespective of whether we have a group of companies, a loss incurred by a trading company can be set off against future profits. It can also be set off against the profits – that is total profits – of a preceding year. A trading loss can be set off against franked investment income, and an investment company can set off management expenses against the income of the current year and the excess can be carried forward and set off against income of a succeeding year. Management expenses cannot be set off against the income of a preceding year. This situation applies to charges on income which can be added to a loss and carried forward or added to management expenses and carried forward in appropriate circumstances but for which there is no provision to set them off against income of a preceding year.

If the company ceases to trade or where sources of non-trading income come to an end, then provision is made in section 87 of the Finance Act 1965 to provide some relief for the fact that corporation tax and income tax will have been charged on the same source of income if the company was carrying on its business or owned the source of income before becoming liable for corporation tax. If the source ceases in 1966–67 or 1967–68, then relief is given in full, but the relief is reduced by a quarter where cessation occurs in 1968–69, by a half in 1969–70 and by three-quarters in 1970–71. Cessations after the latter year will not qualify for relief at all.

Where a trade comes to an end and a trading loss is incurred within the final twelve months of trading, relief for the terminal loss can be claimed by off setting that loss against the income of the three years preceding that final twelve months. This relief is a continuance of the terminal loss relief given by section 18 of the Finance Act 1954.

Group and consortium relief

One has to consider, however, the provisions of section 20 and Schedule 10 of the Finance Act 1967 which provides for group relief and consortium relief.

Basically, where there is the requisite relationship between the companies concerned, the loss of one company can be set off against the profits of the related company who claims the relief. For this purpose the accounting periods have to correspond, and where the accounting periods are not identical then the loss which is available and the profit against which the loss may be set have to be apportioned to the corresponding period.

In the case of group relief, a loss by a parent company can be set off against the profits of a subsidiary; but in the case of a claim for loss relief in a consortium it is only the loss of the consortium company that can be set off against the profits of the member companies of the consortium. Any loss incurred by a member of a consortium cannot be set off against the profits made by the jointly-owned company.

It must be remembered that in a group of companies the ownership of the subsidiary must extend to 75 per cent of the issued ordinary share capital. In consequence if one company owns 75 per cent of another, the fact that the whole of the issued share capital of that other company is owned jointly by five or fewer companies will not enable the other owner companies to get any relief for the loss because the company is a subsidiary and is not for this purpose therefore owned by a consortium.

In the old days when we were concerned with subvention payments it was very important to ensure that one company had at least a 75 per cent interest so that some arrangement could be made for loss relief of the jointly-owned company but where we now have relief given to members of the consortium, it is rather more important if your company is the minority member to ensure that your company has at least 26 per cent and can therefore get some relief for the loss incurred by the jointly-owned company.

The loss for which group relief is given is a trading loss which can be set off against total profits of the parent if the company suffering the loss is a subsidiary, or against the combined profits of the consortium if the company suffering the loss is owned by a consortium. In circumstances where new companies join and leave the group or consortium it will be seen that the provisions of paragraph 7 and paragraph 8 of the Tenth Schedule refer to two companies becoming members of the group. This really means that where one company joins another, they can become a group for this purpose. In the case of a consortium the loss relief which the members of the consortium can claim is proportionate to their interest in the jointly-owned company.

The subject of group relief could occupy a lecture on its own. I have, therefore, set out some –

Rules to remember:

(1) The accounting period is the period of relationship.
(2) Set off previous years' losses first.
(3) Losses of succeeding years are used after group relief.
(4) In a group both companies agree to transfer of loss.
(5) In consortia all companies must agree to transfer loss.
(6) If companies cease to be 'related' – right to relief stays for period of relationship.

With regard to (6), when one company purchases shares in another company, any tax losses remain with the purchased company. If, however, a member of a consortium buys out the interest of another member in the jointly-owned company, the right to a share of the losses of the jointly-owned company remain with the former member of the consortium up to the date of transfer.

Capital gains

If a company sells a trading asset and makes a capital profit which would otherwise be chargeable to corporation tax as a capital gain they may set off the gain computed against the cost of a replacement in the same class, and where companies have that relationship of a group (75 per cent) the gain by one company may be set off against cost of replacement by another company in the same group.

Similarly, where companies have the requisite 75 per cent relationship, assets transferred between group members are exempt, unless and until the asset is disposed of outside the group; when that happens the chargeable gain or allowable loss is to be calculated by reference to the price at which a group company first acquired the asset.

If, therefore, a parent company purchases the shares of another company 'A', which subsequently sells an asset to another subsidiary 'B', which then sells it to a purchaser outside the group, the base from which a gain will be calculated will be the cost to 'A' even though 'A' acquired the asset before joining the group.

It used to be possible to avoid corporation tax on capital gains altogether by issuing new shares in a new group company in return for an asset at its current market value, then selling the shares at cost. Such arrangements have, however, been nullified by Schedule 12, Finance Act 1968, through the notorious paragraphs 18, 19 and 20.

Paragraph 18 provides that where a company which is a member of a group ceases to be a member of the group or ceases to be resident in the United Kingdom, a chargeable gain must be calculated if assets were transferred to that company from other members of the group on the basis that the transfer of the assets was made at open market value at that time. The liability to corporation tax on the capital gain so calculated is charged on the company leaving the group, not on the company which transferred the assets, and the company which leaves the group is subject to the assessment at the time when it ceases to be a member of the group. In default the transferor company is liable. The fact that the sale of the shares reflects the increase in the assets of the company does not make any difference, so there is every probability, unless one is careful, that there will be a double charge to tax: one on the sale of the shares, and one on the calculation of the capital gain from the transfer of the assets.

The paragraph only applies to companies leaving the group after April 10th, 1968, if the transfer of the assets was made after April 6th, 1965, within the six years prior to the company ceasing to be a member of the group. To some extent this penal provision can be mitigated if the assets are transferred to any company which is likely to be sold at open market value, when at least the capital gain on the transfer of those assets will be realized or if the asset is transferred to the company in return for shares. Similarly, if the shares in a company are sold, the possibility of a double charge can be avoided if assets are sold separately. If this is done, then when shares are sold there will not be a second charge of tax on the same gain. Note – it is the company which is the transferee of the assets which ceases to be a member of the group which is charged to tax and consequently anyone buying the company must, for his own protection, obtain an indemnity from the transferor against this liability.

Now let us look at paragraph 19. This paragraph applies where a subsidiary company ceases to be a member of a group at any time after April 10th, 1968, and on an earlier occasion its shares were disposed of by another company which was then a member of the group in the course of an amalgamation or reconstruction in the group. The general principle that this transaction must have occurred within the previous six years and after April 6th, 1965, applies; this paragraph was enacted to prevent the avoidance of a liability to corporation tax on a capital gain from a transaction in shares when there has been, in fact, a reconstruction – which for capital gains purposes means paper for paper.

Finally, there is paragraph 20. This paragraph refers to what is described as a 'depreciatory transaction' and is entirely of an anti-avoidance nature – designed to prevent any tax advantage ensuing from the creation of an artificial loss where after April 10th, 1968, shares are disposed of and their value has been materially reduced by any disposal of assets by one member of a group to another.

Transfer of trade

Two points of importance are the opportunity to transfer a trade from one member of a group to another under section 61 of the Finance Act 1965, which is very much in line with section 17 of the Finance Act 1953 regarding the transfer of trade from one company to another where there is a 75 per cent interest in the one company by the other, and the 75 per cent interest in the trade continues both before and after. Unlike section 17, however, the transfer of the trade only applies where the trade is transferred from one company to another and not where the trade is transferred by a company to an individual. Under this provision the losses incurred in the course of carrying on the trade by one company can be transferred with that trade to a succeeding company.

The Inland Revenue may argue that the meaning of the section is that the loss which can be carried forward can only be set off against the profit of that same trade and not a new trade carried on by the transferee company. It is, however, very difficult to separate two trades when for corporation tax purposes there would normally be only one Case I assessment on a company that was carrying on a continued trade, i.e., where two trades are virtually amalgamated. Such a suggestion should therefore be resisted. Capital losses cannot be transferred. They can only be used by set off against capital gains of the same company. Consequently, it may be necessary to transfer assets available for sale to other subsidiaries with capital gains.

The other point about reconstructions is the possibility of acquiring further companies transferring businesses to new companies within the group and incurring the dangers inherent in that fatal section 65 and Schedule 17 of the Finance Act 1965.

Dividend stripping

This section applies to dividend stripping and in broad terms the provisions relate to a company of which not less than 10 per cent of any type of share in issue are held by another company, and after acquisition of at least 10 per cent a dividend is paid by the acquired company out of profits earned before the date of acquisition of the shares. If the dividend which is paid is deemed to be a 'stripped' dividend and the recipient company is a share dealer, it is treated as unfranked income. If the recipient company is not a share dealer, the net amount of the stripped dividend is treated as a capital distribution for the purposes of capital gains tax.

If the dividend is paid within one year of acquisition of the shares and the rate of distribution is not greater than the annual rate over the past three years prior to acquisition nor exceeds a normal return on the investment, then exemption can be obtained; but if this is not the case, rigid rules apply for computing the post-acquisition profit of the company paying the dividend. These post-acquisition profits are not the accounting profits which are taken to profit and loss account for ordinary Companies Act accounting purposes where the pre-acquisition profits are put to reserves, but are profits computed for corporation tax purposes without any deduction for investment allowances (if any) or initial allowances or free depreciation in excess of the rate of 15 per cent and without any addition for balancing charges; though if another company has made a claim for group relief this has to be deducted as a loss.

Now these provisions do not only apply where companies are acquired by 'bad boys' because the company is loaded with cash or it is intended to pay a great big dividend and set off a loss to recover the tax. The provisions of Schedule 17 and section 65 are penal and while provisions enable exemption to be claimed if shares in company 'A' who is a member of a group, are transferred to company 'B', and both 'A' and 'B' are subsidiaries of the same parent ,then the accumulated profits in company 'A' can be distributed to company 'B' in the normal way without any problem; but if a new subsidiary is formed, called 'C', which has no previous existence, and the shares of company 'A' and company 'B' are transferred to that company, then all the accumulated profits in companies 'A' and 'B' paid as dividends to company 'C' will be pre-acquisition profits and cannot be distributed as dividend to the parent. This is a trap for the unwary to be avoided only by distributing the accumulated profits before the reconstruction takes place. Also note that the issue of bonus shares and subscription in rights issues constitute the acquisition of new holdings on which dividends paid may constitute 'stripped' dividends.

Automatic Feed for Photocopier

AN office copier which will automatically provide one or more copies of up to 200 originals after once being set is now available from the 3M Company Ltd.

Suitable for making, say, five copies of a 40-page report, up to 25 copies can be dialled, the originals stacked into the feed tray and the press button started. This model, known as the 209AF has been developed from the company's model 209, and employs the same dual spectrum dry process which uses no inks, chemicals or powders.

Clerical Work-improvement Programme

DURING the next twelve months, teams of work measurement analysts will be visiting all the 2,653 branches of Barclays Bank throughout England and Wales to implement a clerical work-improvement programme. The scheme is being organized by the Management Services Department which recently purchased 95 Omal Contex 10 portable, hand-operated calculators to equip the teams for their various calculating tasks.

The job content and work throughput of each employee function is to be examined and subsequently measured, and the actions translated into elements of time. The results will be interpreted in terms of systems improvements, and optimum staffing requirements both for the present and in the light of future demands will be assessed by branch managers and local directors.

The retail price of the Omal Contex 10 calculator is £55 13*s*, which is keyset from an abridged keyboard.

Speedier Service for Telephone Directories

AT present the Post Office has to wait until all sections of a telephone directory are complete and then send them to an outside contractor for binding, which may mean that some parts are ready several months before the finished volume.

Later this year subscribers will be offered rod-type binders to hold up to 3-500 page directories or their equivalent. These will cost eight shillings each and will be available in an art canvas finish in a choice of red, green, light blue and dark blue. This will enable volumes to be made up as parts become available.

At present there are two volumes for outer London directories and another 14, each holding up to five sections, of provincial area directories. About 17 million copies of the 77 main alphabetical and classified directories, which together have 30,000 pages, were issued by the Post Office last year.

New Photocopier Meter Rental Scheme

A NEW meter rental scheme for the Minolta Fax Electrostatic copier has been introduced so that users may lease the machine (value £785) over any period for a basic rental of £16 13*s* 4*d* per month. This includes all services, spares, toner and dispersant supplied free of charge.

The rental charges are based on the copy requirements of the user, and meter rental is on a sliding scale of 2*d* per copy for 2,000 copies a month, to 1·28*d* for 5,000, or 1·16*d* for 10,000, and so on. Added to a cost of 3*d* per A4 sheet of copy paper, this makes a total of 5*d* per copy for 2,000 copies a month reducing to 4·16*d* for 10,000 or 4·06*d* for 20,000.

Document Incinerator

SPECIALLY designed for destroying secret and confidential documents, code books, computer tapes and banknotes to a fine white ash, an incinerator with a door 2 ft wide by 1 ft 10 in. high can be loaded with bundles or bags without separating individual papers or pages.

The doors are then locked with twin locks for which two separate keys are required and unburnt paper cannot be extracted after the doors are locked. Wire mesh prevents sparks and ash from escaping from the top of the chimney and ash can be removed for examination in a tray after incineration. No power or fuel is required; the incinerator is merely loaded, lit and locked and left to do the work. Prices range from £1,100 to £2,500 depending on capacity.

ICI Adopt Decimal Pricing

FROM January 1st, ICI have adopted decimal pricing for certain products from three of their divisions. These divisions are the Mond, where decimals will be used for all products except lime, and the Agricultural and Nobel divisions which will use decimal pricing for their chemical products.

Individual invoice items will be shown in decimals only, with total invoice amounts being presented additionally in £ s d. ICI stress that once the product changes to decimal pricing, it will not be possible to make exceptions for individual customers who are still working in £ s d, but many firms approached have welcomed the lead that ICI are giving. They also say that this is a change of method and that prices will not be increased because of the alteration.

Dual Currency Cash Registers

A NEW dual currency cash register with electronic light indicators which, at the flick of a switch, can be changed over from £ s d to the £ new pence system and back again, has been introduced after two years of research by Regna Cash Registers Ltd in the UK and their parent company in Norway, Jorgen S. Lien Industrier of Bergen.

There are two models available, one with a single-sided electronic indicator priced £330, the other double-sided priced £395. The indicators operate at electronic speeds and can be read from a considerable distance. Both machines have extra large, heavy duty keys and an automatic safety keyboard which prevents two keys being depressed at the same time. There is also a separate audit roll which records and totals each operation in either currency system.

Company Law Reform

WHILE awaiting the reform of company law in accordance with the recommendations of the committee on the revision of the laws governing commercial concerns, a working party under the chairmanship of M André Oleffe, Director-General of the Banking Commission, has drawn up a code of 'good behaviour' in connection with the provision of information to third parties in company accounts. The code is set out in a booklet entitled Recommendations relating to information published by companies, which is discussed in the Revue Belge des Sciences Commerciales.

Addressed primarily to directors, the recommendations are not intended to impose a set of rigid precepts applicable in every case, but rather they are an invitation to accept the underlying principles in order that by giving all relevant information, company directors may justify the confidence placed in them and the powers conferred on them. They are framed in such a way that the interests of the company should not be adversely affected; if, however, there were a serious risk of disclosure of certain information being detrimental, it is stated that it would be lawful to omit that information and it might be the duty of the directors to do so.

The Revue compares this booklet with the General accounting system for manufacturing concerns which has for many years been the basis of accounting advice and instruction for such companies. As far as general principles go, the assets and liabilities must be shown in the balance sheet in such a way that the reader may understand and appreciate the nature, function and chief characteristics of the assets on the one hand, and the financial resources available on the other. In the same way the items in the profit and loss account must show in their relevant categories the sources and character of the income and charges. The presentation of company accounts will depend primarily on the nature of the company's activities. It will necessarily vary and the emphasis will be different in the case, e.g., of an industrial company, a purely commercial concern, a financial agent, or a research enterprise.

The recommendations with regard to disclosure in the balance sheet and profit and loss account do not consist of an enumeration of minimum or maximum headings, still less of a uniform layout, they intend rather to indicate the principles which should guide the make up of company accounts and the choice of headings used. The Revue goes on to examine the text in detail, interposing references to its own suggested accounting system described in a previous issue, and adding brief comments on the headings recommended.

The Late Professor A. Goudeket

THE Netherlands accountancy profession has sustained a great loss through the death last month of Professor A. Goudeket. As chief internal auditor of N.V. Philips Gloeilampenfabrieken, of Eindhoven, from 1938 to 1964, he contributed appreciably to the expertise and status of internal auditors both in the Netherlands and abroad.

Joining the internal audit department of N.V. Philips Gloeilampenfabrieken in 1926, he gained the diploma of the former Nederlands Instituut van Accountants three years afterwards. He later became a member of the Council of the Nederlands Instituut, and from 1956 until this year held a professorship at the Rotterdam School of Economics.

Professor Goudeket was the author of numerous articles published in professional journals – including The Accountant – on subjects such as long-term planning, the development of modern accounts presentation and the practical application of cost accounting. He will be sadly missed in Dutch and international professional circles.

A Deed of Gratitude

A legacy for the Methodist Homes for the Aged is a means many generous people adopt in expressing gratitude for their own home and for serenity and peace-of-mind in their old age.

There are so many who are less fortunate and for lonely and anxious old people the Methodist Homes for the Aged are a haven and a home. Our constantly growing income from legacies, more than any other factor, has enabled us to embark on the capital expenditure for twenty-eight Homes. Unfortunately even these will accommodate only a few of the hundreds of deserving people on the tragically long waiting list.

We thankfully acknowledge this valuable assistance and ask you please to remember the Methodist Homes for the Aged when advising your clients.

is the best and most promising example. The primary component is 'Auditape' itself – a series of audit routines written in machine language and executed by the use of specification cards developed by the auditor. The system also includes an instruction sheet for computer operators, specification sheets and an operating manual. The system does not require any manipulation on the console of the central processing unit during the auditor's processing of any routine, so that physical observation of the processing is recommended and should be sufficient to maintain control.

Dealing in detail with a specialized audit program to determine the validity of the client's year-end accounts receivable and evaluate their collectibility, Dr Porter concludes that the 'Auditape' system can perform all the significant procedures included in the specialized programs. It considerably reduces the auditor's time spent in using the computer, as compared with the alternative of preparing specialized computer programs for individual client situations, with no significant decrease in effectiveness.

The author says that the American Institute has appointed a computer users' committee to look into this entire problem area.

John Carey Scholarship Fund

THE American Institute of Certified Public Accountants has established a scholarship fund in co-operation with Yale University in honour of Mr John L. Carey, whose retirement last October as the Institute's administrative vice-president was announced in The Accountant of November 2nd last. He will, however, remain as adviser to the President, Mr Ralph E. Kent, until next May.

The scholarship fund, to which members of the American Institute throughout the country are contributing, will provide annual grants to members of the Yale senior class who plan to enrol in graduate programmes in accounting with the intention of pursuing a career in professional accounting.

In announcing the scholarship fund, Mr Ralph E. Kent, the Institute's President, said: 'This is an expression of personal appreciation for a lifetime of devotion to the advancement of the profession, which at the same time advances one of Mr Carey's foremost objectives – the attraction of young people to the profession'.

False Economy to Fire the Auditors

ONE of New York's most distinguished clubs, regular venue of ambassadors and heads of state, has suddenly found itself in danger of being ejected from its imposing mid-town headquarters. So that it may continue to pay the rent, it has had to appeal to its members for an immediate increase in their subscriptions in order to start cutting back a deficit shown on a 'tentative balance sheet' at some £45,000. An additional £25,000 had been accumulated in 'questionable receivables'. Members are understandably indignant to learn of the scale of the loss that has been built up, unbeknown to them, over the last year.

In self-defence, the club's management pointed to a number of economy moves that they had made in their efforts to put the finances back on an even keel. These included the abolition of monthly reports from the auditors, and the delegation of financial powers to a single official who had repeatedly failed to keep appointments with the club's treasurer and auditors. These measures are now being hastily reversed. Indeed, a new book-keeper has been appointed and the club's auditors are working overtime and at week-ends to get the situation under control.

The outcome of these emergency measures remains in doubt. In spite of talk of bringing a suit against the now-departed official, members are under no delusions that the auditing reinforcements will be able to recover the cash that mysteriously disappeared during the economy campaign.

Cheques and Cash

IT seems that carelessness with cash is alarmingly high and on the increase. A survey of Americans shows that about seven million of them lose some money during the course of a year and that the total now amounts to the equivalent of £850 million. This figure has apparently doubled since 1965.

For reasons that are easy to read, this survey was sponsored by one of the leading issuers of travellers' cheques. With cash losses usually uninsurable, the losers are becoming more and more anxious to devise ways of protecting their supplies of cash in hand; they find small consolation in the fact that inflation has been eating away the value of the dollars they lose as well as of the dollars they keep. Travellers' cheques offer an obvious and increasingly popular way out of the danger. Yet their very success is beginning to create problems.

Issuing banks are finding that cheques can be forged more readily than currency notes, so that offers of immediate refunds to the loser can be costly to the issuer. Issuers are also finding it hard to protect themselves against the growing number of thefts of travellers' cheques – now a frequent occurrence at some airports, railway stations and hotels. The thief does not even have to risk detection when presenting the cheques for cashing. A network of so-called 'centralizers' is believed to operate in most large cities, providing a market in which the stolen paper can be sold – though admittedly at only some 10 per cent of the face value.

The increasing number of companies and individuals who keep a liquid reserve in the form of travellers' cheques are protected from this type of mark-down, provided that they keep sufficient records of dates, amounts and numbers to satisfy the issuers. The latter, however, are understandably concerned to avoid honouring their cheques twice over. They find that they have to maintain their own detective services for this purpose, as well as calling in the assistance of the FBI and Scotland Yard.

Entrance Examinations for Management Consultants

THE Institute of Management Consultants of Ontario has announced that it is introducing written examinations as a condition of admission and claims to be the first management consulting body in the world to do so, reports The Canadian Chartered Accountant for December. A consultant who wishes to write the examination must have a university degree or be a chartered accountant and have had three years' recent experience as a practising management consultant.

Finance and Commerce

Imperial Tobacco

IMPERIAL Tobacco Group is certainly less of a mouthful than the company's former title of Imperial Tobacco Company (of Great Britain and Ireland) – a title originally taken in 1901. The accent is now very much on 'Group' with, at the last balance sheet date, 22 per cent of capital employed outside the tobacco industry and 15½ per cent of profits outside it as well.

Imperial Tobacco Group – through Golden Wonder Crisps – currently controls just over 40 per cent of the UK crisp market and in 1967–68 made a crisp trading profit of just over £1 million in the process. Crisps account for almost a third of the food division's trading profit of £3·2 million. The HP Sauce and National Canning companies are the main other food division subsidiaries, National Canning being better known through the name of its 'Smedley' business.

One of the most interesting parts of the food division is Glendevon Farms (Winchburgh) in which a majority shareholding has recently been acquired. The Glendevon project is aimed at improving the strain and quantity of sheep and lambs and is in fact doing for this end of the farming industry what has been done for the poultry side in terms of production and marketing.

Tobacco confidence

The predominance of the tobacco industry is obvious and there is no suggestion of doubt in the Imperial Group in the prospect of the tobacco division. Successive increases in tobacco duty and the attention directed to the subject of smoking and health have failed to stop the growth in the tobacco business. The growth has in all probability been slowed but it has not been entirely prevented.

The Imperial Group now accounts for some 66 per cent of the total cigarette market, 62 per cent of the pipe tobacco market and 50 per cent of the cigar market. What this means in terms of tobacco stocks, duty and combined financing can be judged from the balance sheet. The increase in tobacco duty in last year's Budget resulted in an exceptional profit of a net £845,000, taken, as normal policy, direct to reserve. Already in the current year there has been last November's 'regulator' increase in duty.

It would perhaps be naïve to expect that a company which is affected to such a substantial degree with the Customs and Excise and which effectively raises so much for the Revenue would get some benefit of the doubt in exceptional duty circumstances. But the debiting of £941,000 net against revenue reserves to cover 'unrecovered Customs duty on flood-damaged tobacco', shows that, as ever, the Revenue insists on cake and eating. Tobacco on which duty had been paid was made useless by floods in Bristol. The company tried to get the tobacco duty back – but the law was interpreted in the Revenue's favour.

Investment income

Apart from trading operations – tobacco and non-tobacco – investment income is a major contributor to Imperial Tobacco Group's income. In the year under review investment income rose by £547,000 to £10,588,000, largely on account of an increased final dividend from British American Tobacco Co Disposal of almost the whole of the group's holding in the Gallaher company did not affect investment income during the year.

Virtually the whole of the investment income is regarded as distributable by way of dividend to Imperial Tobacco shareholders. Of the £22·4 million cost of the ordinary dividend for 1967–68, £10·2 million was provided by investment income and £12·2 million by trading profit. The ordinary dividend is covered 1·52 times and the cover for that part of the dividend contributed from trading profit is 1·96 times.

These and many other facts are gleaned from the directors' report – 'gleaned' is not the correct word; 'harvested' would be better. The report is extremely informative as is the entire 32-page production to which shareholders are treated. There is also a less formal but equally informative and much more lavish annual production for employees. This column remembers one year, before Imperial Tobacco completely changed its style of reporting, that the production for employees provided much more information than did the report and accounts issued to shareholders.

Detail

But that is now very much something of the past. The Imperial Tobacco accounts are a model of information and clarity of presentation. The report begins with a contents page and is followed by the notice of meeting and a page setting out the group structure by divisions. Page 4 is a diary page giving dividend and interest payment dates, the date when half-year results will be announced (July 23rd) and the 'Doomsday' prices for the ordinary shares and all classes of stock for capital gains tax purposes. There is then 'Results in Brief' beginning with turnover and providing a précis of results and of the balance sheet and showing trading profit as a percentage of group operating capital (17·1 per cent as against 15·5 per cent in 1966–67).

The directors' report takes eight pages and the accounts and notes a further eight. Then there is a page of detail of investments, including their market value at balance sheet date, balance sheet valuation and income. The auditors' report is followed by two pages providing a summary of sales, profits and funds – reading from left to right, incidentally – with latest figures on the far right. There is a similar summary of balance sheets over the next two pages, and finally five pages providing detail of the activities of the group giving the names of separate divisional companies and their products, detail of associated companies and further details of a selection of branded products of the Group.

Supplementary notes

1 Contingent liabilities:
The parent company and certain of its subsidiaries have given guarantees in connection with employees' pension schemes. The parent company has obligations thereunder not provided for in these accounts, which may involve annual payments from 1972 onwards dependent upon future actuarial valuations.
There is a contingent liability of £450,000 on a holding of a subsidiary company of 500,000 'A' ordinary shares of £1 (2/– paid) in the Commonwealth Development Finance Company Ltd.

2 (a) The approximate amounts of contracts for capital expenditure not provided for in the accounts, of which it is estimated that £2,630,000 for the Group and £1,910,000 for the parent company will qualify for investment grants, are:

	1968 £000's	1967 £000's
Group	4,410	5,160
Parent company	2,630	3,000

(b) The approximate amounts of capital expenditure authorised by the Directors for which contracts have not yet been placed are £3,910,000 (1967 £1,720,000) for the Group and £760,000 (1967 £490,000) for the parent company, of which it is estimated that £1,560,000 and £270,000 respectively will qualify for investment grants.

3 The parent company is under an obligation, not provided for in these accounts, to pay U.S. $378,000 per annum for the next 21 years in respect of past service liability arising from the pension scheme for employees in U.S.A. and Canada.

4 Assets and liabilities in foreign currencies have been converted into sterling on the following bases:
(a) fixed assets in U.S.A. and Canada purchased before 31st October 1939: at $4.86 to £1.
(b) other fixed assets: at rates ruling when purchased.
(c) current assets and liabilities: at the rates of exchange ruling on 31st October 1968.

5 The Directors are of the opinion that the financial year of a subsidiary engaged in buying leaf tobacco abroad should terminate soon after the end of the buying season and for this reason the accounts of that company are made up to 30th April in each year.

CITY NOTES

THERE have been, over the past four years or so, varying degrees of lack of confidence in economic and fiscal policy, but it is doubtful whether there has been a lack of confidence to such a degree as there is now.

Possibly the situation over Anguilla has tended to heighten the confidence loss point. Anguilla appears to be a parallel to economic policy in being a matter of doing nothing for too long and then attempting the dramatic too late.

Failure to take initial action and a subsequent failure to appreciate the consequences of belated action have characterized the economic and fiscal policies of the past four years. The City has had to live with these twin failures of Government.

The comparatively recent course of events of the mid-1968 easing of credit conditions which turned devaluation from a possibility into the inevitable, the subsequent apparent encouragement of a vast upsurge in consumer spending and the failure of the 1968 Budget to grapple with it combine into a sequence of events of Anguilla parallel.

It is now gradually becoming apparent that the import deposit scheme is failing as an economic instrument and, through the process of deposits being financed by the importers' customers overseas, is neither holding down imports nor helping to hold down prices. The cost of the deposit is being passed on in prices and a number of company statements are now making that clear.

There is currently a growing demand for quantitative control of imports as the only reliable and workable method of import reduction and trade and balance of payments improvement.

*   *   *   *

IT is in the sphere of confidence that the Gas Council's raising of money on the German money market must be seen. International oil companies themselves finance the search for and the development of North Sea gas but the British Gas Council has to go to Germany to raise loan money to finance gas pipeline construction. German funds can be raised at 6½ per cent against the 8½ per cent or very probably 9 per cent the Gas Council would have to pay to raise funds on the London market. Underwriting a Gas Council loan, at the present stage of the London new issue market proceedings, would be a difficult business. Not for a long time have underwriters been so heavily left with new issue commitments.

*   *   *   *

MARCH figures from the unit trusts should prove decidedly interesting. In February the unit trust industry still attracted funds on a heavy scale but withdrawals were virtually at the £10 million market as some far-sighted holders of trust units saw the writing on the stock-market wall. February intake benefited from some extremely successful block offers but March figures may tell a different intake and outgo story.

*   *   *   *

EVEN though March may not show up so well as February for the unit trusts in terms of net money attraction, there is some evidence, in the number of mergers developing, that the investment trusts are beginning to look to their slightly tarnished laurels. The investment trust merger movement is expected to go further and there is a fair argument as to why it should do so.

Probably the strongest of the arguments is that competition for investment management expertise is now fierce. The institutions, the banks, merchant banks and stockbroking and jobbing firms – quite apart from unit trusts – are recruiting the investment management and investment statistical staff that used to be the monopoly of the investment trusts. There is not the management or the staff to go round.

That alone will enforce investment trust mergers at an accelerating pace over the coming months.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Integration of the Profession

SIR, – The comment in the English Institute's February Newsletter claiming widespread support for the 'development scheme' is unfortunate in tending to create an atmosphere of prejudgement. By proceeding to state that, because of such assumed support, a members' meeting would now be held to consider the scheme in principle, the Council has apparently overlooked the intimation in the President's introductory letter that such a meeting had always been planned.

The assumption of support is not necessarily correct and the undersigned members in commerce and industry, after having the benefit and courtesy of discussions at the highest level in the Institute, would like to express their contrary views. We do this as mutually well-acquainted individuals and not as representing any group.

We feel that the scheme for the development of the accountancy profession is not demonstrated in the Institute booklet or in subsequent recorded arguments as having substantial merits, but that on the contrary, it contains some severely retrograde elements. We fully support the desire to raise standards of entry into the profession and of training and examination qualification, but these are matters which are not related to a scheme of amalgamation as such and might well be undertaken by any of the subscribing bodies on their own account.

There exist, we believe, certain characteristics of the chartered accountant. From our experience in industry we incline towards several assumptions in considering the recruitment of a qualified man for a position in industry. A cost and works accountant would have a certain basic knowledge of costing, management accounting, and other relevant aspects; a municipal accountant would not necessarily have direct knowledge of the incidence of cost/profit reporting; and a chartered accountant also would not necessarily, merely by virtue of his membership qualifications, have a detailed knowledge of a particular industry's costing and management control procedures. None of this is to say that there are watertight compartments of any kind. In the case of the chartered accountant, however, his experience with diverse types of client during his service with a practising firm has a unique value which, in fact, is demonstrated by a facility for rapid familiarization with the problems of particular industrial companies or with other financial environments. Other professional bodies have their own individually valuable characteristics. We should not be deterred by accusations of assumptions of superiority in claiming that this feature of experience in practising offices and the variety which it provides is not to be thrown away lightly and certainly not for the vague suggestions of benefit in the amalgamation scheme.

Under the proposed dispensation some of us would be given the responsibility of becoming principals to clerks in training. Whilst ready to discharge this duty to the best of our ability, we take the view that on the whole the experience gained within our various establishments would be markedly inferior to and narrower than that which we obtained during our service with practising principals. If circumstances were such that we were forced to this procedure because of the need for an increased output of qualified men (though we are not of the opinion that this is so), then the change might have to be accepted with whatever safeguards could be devised. But it cannot be turned into an apparent virtue of the scheme; indeed, its severely retrograde nature must be recognized. It may well be that practising members feel the burden of training articled clerks, many of whom leave their firms for industry very soon after qualification, and sympathy must be felt in these circumstances. However, we regard the importance of training in practising offices as such that this should be regarded as an inescapable consequence of the basis of training.

Doubts have been expressed on the adequacy of training in small practitioners' offices, but we think these fears may often be misplaced. Indeed, paragraph 32 of the scheme acknowledges this, but practitioners reading the reference there to not losing the right to take articled clerks may think the reservations in Appendix C, in themselves reasonable enough, to be seriously contradictory. Others might be excused for regarding this discrepancy as evidence of indecision on a vital point.

The scheme grossly oversimplifies the division of expertise as evidenced by the examination subjects specified for the practising and industrial streams respectively. The position of the accountant in industry is enormously variable. It is not valid to consider that the subject of accounting investigation and appraisal is more appropriate for the practising man than the industrial man – often the reverse is the case. It is not necessarily true that the industrial man's level of taxation study should be less profound. Refinements of streaming are very hard to make with any chance of relevance. It is far better to aim at a consistent syllabus and regard specialization as a 'postgraduate' matter.

The need for some choice on the part of the student on his 'stream' is a new and unwise idea. Amongst other things, it might be, or might seem to the outsider to be, that this could reduce the flow of newly-qualified men from practising offices into industry; indeed, if the streaming concept is effective as such, it would have this effect. It is difficult enough already to keep hold of the idea of unity within the profession, but this would promote disunity and a feeling that, despite the common title, there were several different animals less bound by mutual breeding than at present, as in fact would be the case.

At present, the designation 'chartered accountant' is generally taken by others to indicate the existence of a wide degree of expertise in financial matters without too much reference to the nature of his current activity as being in practice or in industry or otherwise. The streaming involved in the scheme, in terms of training and examination subjects, must militate eventually against such universality of general regard. It is thought that this separation would be regrettable.

We are not impressed by the possibility of persuading the Government to impose a closed shop by effectively prohibiting the formation of further 'fringe' accounting bodies. This objective may well not be achieved and in any event we cannot accept that the dilution (we can avoid the word no longer) involved by absorbing existing bodies with differing derivations is desirable. It is noted that several existing bodies have indeed refused the opportunity to negotiate on this matter.

Equally we are unimpressed by observations on the impossibility of obtaining university co-operation without a merger. This would seem an unreasonable academic reaction and one would hope it could be overcome. If not, the price – absence of such co-operation – is a less heavy blow than merger.

We would more readily have considered eliminating the national boundaries between the various chartered bodies, but this theme will not be pursued here except to point out the confusion which failure to achieve this must cause in the minds of others.

In conclusion, it is felt that the scheme of amalgamation should be abandoned, but that other elements of the proposals such as those concerning standards of entry, training procedure and the like, be examined with a view to their application within the existing Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales (or in Great Britain, or in the British Isles).

Our present intention is to vote against the scheme. We hope that from its defeat there may arise the benefit of implementation of the many sound elements of improvement derived from the intensive work of Council and staff during the past few years.

SIR, – Nothing that has been said or written on the subject since the publication of my letter in your issue of November 9th, 1968, has convinced me that the proposal to give practising certificates to junior members would be anything but disastrous.

'The public interest' has far wider connotations than is implied in the phrase 'reserved functions'. The accountant's practice today must comprehend the many constantly changing and interlocking problems faced by ordinary citizens as a result of non-stop legislation and the increasing complexity of business life.

If a man is not competent to master those imaginatively esoteric 'reserved functions' then he is not capable of understanding and advising over the wide field of a practising accountant's work which falls outside that definition. To label him 'chartered accountant (Grade 2)', and to give him a certificate which can only mislead the innocent (and many businessmen are certainly that), is not a function which should be reserved to the premier body of accountants.

We can surely visualize the confusion in the public mind if there were varying grades of practising dentists, solicitors or doctors! Why are we so blind in the organization of our own profession? Have we fallen for the pernicious pseudo-egalitarianism which holds that if Bloggins has a certificate then Buggins must have one too?

The recent 'White Paper' issued by the Council, replying to various criticisms of the scheme, avoids all the real issues on this point. No one wishes to deny a junior member the 'right to exercise his craft'. He can do so as a respected employee in industry, in commerce, in the public service and in professional offices. Nor, in the existing state of the law, can he be denied the right to practise.

But why should the Institute feel obliged to give certificates of competence to practise, to those who are clearly regarded as not fully trained? The junior member wishing to practise should either work for his full qualification or resign from the Institute. And if, as the Council claims, there will be few such members who wish to exercise this right, then few will be deterred from obtaining the junior qualification if the position is quite clear from the outset.

Unfortunately, as I feared, it is 'the scheme, the whole scheme and nothing but the scheme' and, since I am so strongly against Proposal 20, there is no alternative but to vote against the resolution approving the scheme in principle.

Yours faithfully,

Oswestry. F. L. CONSTABLE, F.C.A.

SIR, – The papers concerning the Institute's special meeting on April 17th have now been issued. I have hitherto refrained from expressing my views publicly as it seemed right for me to do this at the meeting.

Last year at the Institute's annual general meeting the Council was defeated on one resolution by Mr Couldery and his associates, largely I think because the voting took place before all the arguments produced at the meeting were heard. Following the subsequent special general meeting, and before voting, all members were given a transcript of the proceedings at the meeting and the result was that the previous resolution was rescinded.

We are now asked to vote on integration, the most important proposals during my membership of 30 years, before knowing what happens at the meeting. Thus the same mistake is being made as at the annual general meeting in 1968. When will they ever learn!

In place of the proceedings at the meeting we have been issued with a report on meetings held in district societies. This report may be true, but in my opinion it is certainly not fair.

The Council, protagonists for integration, have set out briefly 'Matters about which further information was requested or criticisms were made'. The reasons behind the criticisms are not as fully developed as they could have been. They have then given their answers and arguments, at four times the length of the criticisms, and in my view have failed to answer many of them satisfactorily.

The curious mixture of fact, opinion and propaganda contained in the papers sent to members could well mislead them into deciding the issues wrongly. Here is one example.

The President has sent us all a covering letter urging us to support the proposals. He suggests that if the scheme is rejected, the activities of the Institute will revert to the 'narrower field of accountancy for stewardship'. In a speech to the Sheffield and District Society (see page 385 of your issue dated March 15th), the President states, 'The issue is simply "Did they believe there should be two professions, one engaging in the narrower field of the practitioner (auditing and taxation) and the other engaged in the field of management information?".'

All I can ask is whether anyone really believes that accountants working for one company or a group are in a broader field than those in practice who act and advise in connection with the affairs of many companies and individuals covering many different fields in addition to auditing and taxation.

The President's use of the word 'narrower', on two separate occasions indicates a lack of knowledge of what the practising chartered accountant does, imports prejudice into the whole matter and certainly to my mind is neither true nor fair.

Unless the Council will defer the vote on integration until the issue of a transcript of the proceedings at the meeting on April 17th has been circulated, I appeal to all members to attend the meeting, hear the discussion – in particular the views of those against in their own unedited words – and then vote in person. Unless I hear more convincing arguments for integration than those so far produced I shall myself vote against resolutions 1 and 2, and for resolution 3.

Yours faithfully,

London EC4. HUGH T. NICHOLSON, F.C.A.

SIR, – I have studied the Council's comments on this subject as published in the Institute's February Newsletter, together with the letter from Mr S. C. Hand, who is against the proposals and resigned from the Council on this issue.

In my opinion the Council's case is quite unconvincing. To me it reads like having decided to do something and then looking around for fitting reasons to satisfy members why it should be done.

Surely if the case on such an important matter is right, we do not need all these meetings and writings to convince us that it is. The truth is that the case, if there be one, is at best a marginal case.

We have become accustomed in recent years to new proposals being developed by politicians to deal with current problems and leading, more often than not, to wrong decisions. I think we have one such here. Another was the scheme for the Certificate in Management Information – an acknowledged failure so far.

I agree with others that the new scheme is a package deal but the question is, whom do we have to make a deal with? In my view, nobody.

Are we not chartered accountants? Our grandfathers were so strong-minded in their attitude to this that they refused to countenance association with any other body of accountants. Were they so wrong to take this stand? Must a weakening in our professional attitude, or that of anyone else for that matter, follow the national decline in moral standards that have been sacrificed in favour of so-called practical considerations and which really means no standards at all.

I have since received the papers and notice of the special meeting on April 17th, which I have also carefully studied, as requested by the President. I find the Council's case still unconvincing and the fact that it is described as 'A scheme for the development of the accountancy profession' and not 'A scheme for integration', which it is, does not, in my opinion, add any lustre to the Council's views. Neither could I draw any enthusiasm from the fact that the papers, dated March 14th, arrived (by grace of God intact) on March 20th, in an unsealed envelope.

Yours faithfully,

F. A. LEWIS, F.C.A.

Kenley, Surrey. (in industry).

Selective Employment Tax

SIR, – With Budget day set for Tuesday, April 15th, it is hoped that the Chancellor has taken note of the persistent and informed criticisms of selective employment tax. As a nation, we are repeatedly urged to be export and productivity conscious, yet this farcical tax remains with all its anomalies, serving no purpose other than to stifle investment, curb expansion and reduce efficiency.

This country has the inherent ability and drive to overcome our present financial difficulties but a positive lead from the Chancellor is needed with a forward-looking Budget to include tax incentives such as the repeal of selective employment tax.

Yours faithfully,

DAVID BURNETT,
Executive Director,
COMMITTEE FOR THE REPEAL OF London W1. SELECTIVE EMPLOYMENT TAX.

To Pay, or Not to Pay

SIR, – The appended Shakespearian parody, received from a client together with a second application for tax based on a rather inflated estimated assessment which had been appealed against some months previously, may amuse your readers.

To pay or not to pay?
That is the question.
Whether it is nobler on the pocket
To suffer the slings and arrows
Of outrageous tax demands,
Or to take arms against this Sea of iniquity
And, by opposing, bend them.

To pay? To fight?
To fight – perchance to scheme;
Ay! there's the rub,
For in that fight to the death
What dreams may come
And all the tortures that flesh is Heir to Before we shuffle off this Mortal coil?

To pay or not to pay?
That is indeed the question.
I know I owe, as all men do alas,
So if I must I must . .
But careful we must count
That when we pay our blood
'Tis no more than the right amount.

Yours faithfully,

London. MARTIN GENIS & CO.

FOR STUDENTS

Introduction to Binary Arithmetic – II

by R. E. ELLMER, M.A., F.C.A., A.C.I.S.

REFERENCE to (i) under 'Converting denary to binary' on page 371, March 15th, will demonstrate an example of addition in the binary scale, but no problem of any kind arises because there is only one 0 or one 1 in any one column, and that 0 or 1 is simply placed in the final total row in its appropriate column. Let us now consider a more realistic situation in which 111 is to be added to 101:

 101
-----
1100

The total of 1100 is arrived at as follows:

Starting with the extreme right-hand column, as always, and moving from right to left, we have 1+1 in binary equals 2 in denary. But 2 in denary equals 10 in binary, and therefore 0 is placed in the total row and 1 carried into the second column from the right. The 1 carried from the first column into the second is then added to the 1 which is already there, and we have another pair (2 in denary); again the total is 10, so that 0 is placed in the total row and the 1 carried into the next column. In the third column 1+1 is already 'waiting'; adding therefore the 1 carried from the preceding column we have 1+1+1, of which two form a pair and equal 10, leaving 1 'over', which is placed in the total row, the 1 of the 10 being placed in the fourth column from the right to produce the final 1100.

It will have been grasped that we are really counting in pairs and where there is an even number of digits there will always be an 0 in the total row; and where there is an odd number of digits, the pairings will be removed into the next column to the left, and the odd 1 inserted in the total row.

Before examining a longer example, let us check the accuracy of our work by converting the items into the denary scale and performing the addition in denary, thus:

	Binary	Denary

Now 7+5 in denary=12, which equals 1100 in binary, and is, of course, the total just obtained.

(a)	..	..	1	1	1	0	0	1	0	1	0	1
(b)	..	..	1	1	0	1	1	0	1	0	0	1
(c)	..	..				1	1	1	0	1	1	0
(d)	..	..						1	1	0	0	0

In this explanation, the numbering of the columns will be made from right to left and in the first column we have 11000. The two ones make a pair and equal 10; the 0 is placed in the first place of the total and the 1 carried into the second column where there is 00101. We therefore add the two ones and one brought forward, giving three ones which produce a pair and one over; the one over is placed in the second spot in the total, while the pair – now equal to 1 in a higher column – is carried forward into the third column, where again the two ones in 10100 are waiting to be processed. The 1 'carried' is added to those already there and again we have a pair and 1 over which is placed in the third spot in the total and the pair carried forward as a unit into the fourth column.

The same situation of a pair and one over arises in the fourth column, but in the fifth column we get two pairs by adding the unit brought forward to the existing three ones; a zero is placed in the fifth spot in the total, and the 2 of the two pairs is carried forward into the sixth column where three ones are waiting. So we now have five ones, which produces two pairs and 1 over, the latter being placed in the sixth spot in the total, and the two is carried forward into the seventh column.

Again, enough has probably been demonstrated to show that when the number of ones in a column add up to an 'even' total, a zero is placed in the total line and each pair is 'carried' as 1 into the next column; and when the number of ones produce an 'odd' total a 1 is placed in the total line, each pair similarly being carried forward as 1 to the next column.

In the tenth – and last – column, however, there are already two ones in existence, and with two brought forward we finish up with four ones and nowhere to which they can be carried. The four ones must therefore stand alone, and the four which they equal in denary is translated into four in binary, which is 100. The binary figures 100 are therefore placed in the total row and we accordingly have as our answer 10001110110.

Particular care must be exercised in dealing with the last column and to make the operation quite clear, let us add 1000000000 twice to the answer we have just obtained:

The addition of (f), (g) and (h) is the essence of simplicity, but if we remember that (f) is composed of (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e), it will be realized that we are actually bringing forward the two ones from the ninth columns and therefore we now have six ones as our final piece of addition. Now six in binary is 110, hence 110 is placed in the total row, occupying the tenth, eleventh and twelfth places – as always from the right.

The student of binary is strongly advised to check his progress by reference to denary equivalents in the early stages, and it is now proposed to demonstrate how this may be done, using the last example for the purpose.

Row	Denary Equivalent	Total
(a)	$2^9+2^8+2^7+2^4+2^2+1$	917
(b)	$2^9+2^8+2^6+2^5+2^3+1$	873
(c)	$2^6+2^5+2^4+2^2+2$	118
(d)	2^4+2^3	24
(e)	$2^8+2^6+2^5+2$	354
		2286

The denary total of 2286 is now converted into its binary equivalent by the repeated division by 2 process, thus:

2	2286
2	1143+0
2	571+1
2	285+1
2	142+1
2	71+0	= 1 0 0 0 1 1 1 0 1 1 1 0
2	35+1
2	17+1

The proof demonstrates the correctness of the answer at row (f), and now by adding rows (g) and (h), we shall be in a position to prove the final total in row (i), as follows:

(g)	2^9	512
(h)	2^9	512
Total	.. ..	3310

2	3310
2	1655+0
2	827+1
2	413+1
2	206+1
2	103+0	= 1 1 0 0 1 1 1 0 1 1 1 0
2	51+1
2	25+1
2	12+1

Subtraction in the binary scale

Subtraction in binary presents one problem only, viz. that of understanding how the 'borrowing' technique operates when the digit in the top line, or minuend, is smaller than that in the bottom line, or subtrahend. It is considered an instructive exercise to recapitulate the borrowing techniques used in the denary scale in order to apply the same argument to binary operations. Let us examine the process of subtracting 21,935 from 23,001:

23,001
21,935
 1,066

Always moving from right to left in the basic process of subtraction and from left to right in the subsidiary process of 'borrowing', we see that we cannot take 5 from 1 and must therefore borrow 1 from the first available digit, which in this case happens to be the 3 in the thousands column of the minuend. In point of fact, of course, we are in reality borrowing not 1, but ten from not 3 but 3,000 and the remainder of 2990 now has to be kept in mind as we proceed with the operation. So, 5 from 1 plus the borrowed 10 leaves 6, and this is placed in the units column of the total, or difference, row.

Remembering that we now have 299 in place of the original 300, then 3 from 9 leaves 6, 9 from 9 leaves 0, and 1 from 2 leaves 1, so 106 now goes into the appropriate columns in the total row.

10000
 1111

This is a 'straight' subtraction performed by taking away a series of zeros from a series of ones and no problem arises. The reader who has become conversant with the conversion technique from binary to denary, explained earlier, can check this, thus:

11111 = 31
10000 = 16
 1111   15

Now consider a subtraction where the borrowing technique has to be used, with 100000 as the minuend, and 1111 as the subtrahend:

100000
  1111
------

We now have to subtract 1 from 0, and must therefore borrow 1 – or really one 'pair' – from the sixth place from the right. This leaves a 'trail' of ones in the places occupied by the zeros. Arriving, then, with a pair at the first place, we can subtract the 1 in the subtrahend, leaving the difference of 1 in the total line. In the next three places, 1 is taken from 1 leaving 0; in the fifth place nothing from 1 leaves 1.

To conclude this section, let us check the accuracy of our work by conversion to denary:

1 0 0 0 0 0 = 2^5          = 32
    1 1 1 1 = 2^3+2^2+2+1  = 15
-------------------------------
  1 0 0 0 1 = 2^4+1        = 17

Association of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies

NEC Meeting with Council Members

AT the recent annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the Association of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies with the President and representatives of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales – briefly reported in The Accountant of March 15th – the matters raised for discussion were, in general, on broader issues of policy rather than its specific application.

In some measure, this was due to the fact that the annual meeting has in recent years been supplemented by greater day-to-day contact and by special meetings to consult on specific issues. There has also been created a students' liaison committee which meets periodically.

The following matters were considered and in all cases the discussion is being referred for study to the committees concerned.

Student poll on the development scheme
The results of the student poll on the development scheme were announced (The Accountant, March 15th issue) and their implications discussed.

Survey of salaries
The Executive Committee suggested that adequate information should be collected and published, by the ACASS if necessary, to show regional and national patterns of salaries for articled clerks. This was necessary if recruitment efforts were to be fully effective. For many other careers, school and university leavers could see clearly before committing themselves what the salaries during training would be. Proposals for the content and form of a survey were presented.

Monopolies Commission
The students sought certain information about the Institute's evidence to the Monopolies Commission inquiry into the professions and the present situation. This was given.

Student relations
The students welcomed the continuing improvement in links between the ACASS and the Council. They referred to the benefit to Institute/student relations which had resulted from the circulation to all students of a summary of the scheme for the development of the profession. It was thought that students in general would feel much more a part of the Institute if there was more direct communication between the Council and students. This seemed specially important in the concept of 'student membership'. The President emphasized that this was intended to be not simply a change of name but a change of status. Specific suggestions were discussed. At the request of the students it was agreed to consider urgently the circulation through students' societies, to all students, of the Council's proposed statement to members summarizing members' comments on the scheme for the development of the profession and the Council's comments thereon.

Standard of courses for students
There was a full discussion on the problems of ensuring the efficiency and standards of correspondence, private, oral and public college courses for students.

Full-time education for the profession
The students reported their feeling that there should be a much greater element of full-time education on a sandwich basis for the profession with a practical Final examination. Students would be better fitted to gain the benefits of practical experience if the training period included the equivalent of, say, two academic years of full-time study. There was concern in many students' societies that the educational aspects of future plans were still inadequate to achieve the high standards required. The Council members said that the subject of professional education was one of their main concerns.

Transferability of articles
A closely reasoned case was presented for the much greater transferability of articles. The validity of some parts of the argument was questioned by Council members and the possible consequences of free transferability on professional training were discussed.

Diary of practical experience
The students urged the adoption of a system under which records of practical experience obtained by articled clerks should be examined periodically by the Institute during articles so that deficiencies to be remedied would come to the notice of the Institute before the student applied for admission to membership. It was noted that the scale of such an operation presented serious practical problems but the matter was under review.

Tax relief
The students made known their proposals for further representation to secure relief of income tax for educational expenses incurred by articled clerks.

Abolition of Institute admission fee
It was suggested that the Institute should abolish the admission fee for membership with an appropriate adjustment to the annual subscription of associates and thus maintain its income. This would greatly reduce the immediate cost of admission to membership and would have tax advantages for the member.

Nine-month course students and students' societies
There was a discussion on how to ensure that college-based students participated from the outset in students' society activities.

In Parliament

ACCOUNTANTS

Mr RICHARD WAINWRIGHT asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether the Civil Service admits for consideration applications in answer to Government advertisements for qualified accountants, which are submitted by accountants authorized on an individual basis by the Board of Trade in respect of the Companies Acts.

Mr GEORGE THOMSON: I have been asked to reply.

No, Sir. Applicants for professional accountants' posts in the Civil Service must normally be chartered or certified accountants.

Mr WAINWRIGHT: Will the right hon. gentleman bear in mind that, in a period of acute nation-wide shortage of experienced accountants, this small body of experienced people to which my question refers might have a contribution to make.

Mr THOMSON: I think that there are discussions taking place at the moment between this body and my right hon. friends. I think that we ought to leave it at that for the moment.

Mr RICHARD WAINWRIGHT asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many known members of the following professional bodies are at present employed in the Civil Service, namely, The Institutes of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, of Scotland, and of Ireland, taken together, The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, and The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, respectively.

Mr GEORGE THOMSON: I have been asked to reply.

Very approximately, 300, 160 and 130.

Mr WAINWRIGHT: Is the right hon. gentleman aware that this is a very small proportion of the total number of Civil Servants engaged in accountancy work at relatively high levels and that, in an era when the Government are in constant dialogue with industry, there would be great advantages if a number of accountants on either side came from the same disciplines and were able to speak to each other in roughly the same language?

Mr THOMSON: There is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says, but future policy of recruitment and deployment of accountants must be considered in the light of the recommendations of the Fulton Report and the outcome of the present proposals for a merger of the bodies concerned.

Mr MOLLOY: While we acknowledge the problems facing people in the professional grades of the Civil Service, will my right hon. friend bear in mind that there is a need to encourage junior grades in terms of the avenues of promotion open to them and their prospects of achieving a reasonably high status within the service?

Mr THOMSON: Yes, Sir, but that is a wider question.

Hansard, March 17th, 1969. Oral answers, col. 13.

Mr FORD asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware of the shortage of accountants; what advice he has received from his Companies Act Accountancy Advisory Committee in this respect; whether he will list the members of the committee, giving their professional qualifications and the organizations or firms with which they are associated; and on what dates the committee last met and during the preceding five years.

Mr DELL: I have not received advice from the Companies Act Accountancy Advisory Committee on this matter, which is outside the committee's terms of reference. I will circulate in the Official Report the names, professional qualifications and associations of the members of the committee. The committee last met on May 21st, 1968, and met previously on June 22nd, 1965, December 3rd, 1964, and May 4th, 1964.

Following is the information:

Mr R. G. Leach, F.C.A. (Chairman), senior partner in Messrs Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co.

Mr S. R. Harding, F.C.A., financial director, The Thomas Tilling Group.

Mr D. S. Morpeth, F.C.A., partner in Messrs Touche, Ross, Bailey & Smart.

Mr FORD asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he will state the criteria which he uses to decide whether or not to recognize associations of accountants under section 161 (1) (a) of the Companies Act 1948.

Mr DELL: The Board of Trade have regard to the standard of the body's examinations, the proportion of members who have passed the examinations, disciplinary arrangements, and the number of members in practice and in employment.

DU PONT

Young Accountants

If you want a very special job, read this and act. NOW.

You are aged, let us say, 22–26. You hold a Chartered or Cost or Certified Accountant's qualifications. You believe you are cut out for big things. You are alert, energetic, ambitious, but are finding it difficult to get something worthy of your ability.

If this, in fact, is your problem, it is more than possible that you will find your answer at BOAC. For here you will be destined for considerably more important things, starting in about 10 years from now if you are good enough. Then, the number of senior accountants retiring from service will – for a number of reasons – be substantially higher than usual; and to equip those who are to succeed them we must act now. The reason for this is that the people we select for these important jobs will, initially, be given a thorough two-year training covering widely differing activities, varying according to our needs and theirs.

Following this initial training, the men concerned will spend 2–3 years in each of the accounting branches of four main divisions or departments, viz: Flight Operations or Engineering; Properties or Information; Commercial; and Finance. On successful completion of this comprehensive training-on-the-job period, every accountant who has participated will be ready and – if he is able – undoubtedly willing to take one of the senior or semi-senior appointments which by that time will have become available.

Here, then, is an enviable opportunity to pursue an accounting career of rare promise, interest and reward in the service of one of the world's great airlines. It is an opportunity you are well-advised to seize while you can – now. Salary progression is excellent but will start at £1,749 per annum whilst under training. Conditions and fringe benefits are also very good and opportunities exist for holiday air travel. For an interview write fully at once to: Manager Selection Services (A 109), BOAC, P.O. Box 10, Heathrow Airport – London, Hounslow, Middx.
